V. 22—33. Our best desires may meet with many hinderances; our well concerted plans may be disappointed; our very prayers may seem to remain unanswered; but, proceeding in the path of duty with self-denying zeal and love, endeavouring to conciliate the minds of Christians to one another, and to excite them to emulation in good works; and seeking our comfort in communion with God and his saints; all will surely terminate to our advantage: and even the services which we would have performed and could not, shall be graciously accepted and rewarded. (Note, 1 Kings 8:15—21.) The rich believer should deem himself a debtor to the poor; and they who have been made partakers of spiritual blessings, should count it "their duty" to minister in carnal things to those, through whom they were brought to the knowledge of salvation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:7—12. Gal. 6:6—10.)—There is a blessing, "a fulness of blessing, in the gospel of Christ," which we should expect to know and to communicate, but with which numbers are totally unacquainted, and which most of us experience in a degree far beneath what the primitive believers did: especially the degree in which the preaching and labours of ministers at present are blessed to the conversion of sinners, and the edifying and rejoicing and fruitfulness of believers, compared with that of former times, is lamentably small. We should therefore "strive," nay wrestle, "together in our prayers" for each other, that for "Christ's sake," and by "the love of the Spirit," a very great blessing may come upon the souls of Christians, and the labours of ministers that envy, prejudice, and a party-spirit may not prevent the faithful zealous servants of Christ, from being "accepted by the saints," in their disinterested endeavours to do them good, as alas! is frequently the case, but that they may meet the people, wherever they go, with joy, and may by them be refreshed; and that the God of peace may be the ever-present Comforter of all, who "love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Amen.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that this epistle was sent by Phebe, according to what is generally added at the end of it, in our Bibles; but as these additions are of no authority, and sometimes palpably erroneous, they are not here inserted.—Cenchrea was the sea port of Corinth, where a separate church was founded, which shows that the apostle wrote from Corinth. (Acts 18:18.)—Phebe acted as a servant, or a deaconess, to the church at Cenchrea, and was probably employed in relieving the needy, and visiting the sick women among them. This she must have undertaken freely, out of love to the work alone, as she appears to have been a person in good circumstances. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 1 Tim. 5:9—16.) The Christians at Rome were exhorted to receive her to their fellowship, in a manner consistent with their profession of being the "saints" or holy servants and worshippers of the true God, in Christ Jesus: (Marg. Ref. e, f.) and also to assist and support her in the business, which had brought her thither: as she had been helpful to many Christians, and to Paul himself, who was not backward to acknowledge his obligation to her.

V. 3, 4. Aquila and Priscilla had now returned to Rome: though but a short time before they had been at Ephesus. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Notes, Acts 18:1—6,24—28. 1 Cor. 16: 19,20.) They had ventured their lives in protecting the apostle either at Corinth, or at Ephesus; as if they had been willing to lay down their own necks, and to be beheaded in his stead: and as his life was so useful to all the churches of the Gentiles, they as well as he, were under the greatest obligations to these pious persons. (Marg. Ref. k—m.) He therefore sent his affectionate salutations and good wishes to them, and to the church in their house; or to the several Christians, of whom their family was composed, and who met continually together to worship God.—Priscilla and Aquila had originally been inhabitants of Rome. (Acts 18:2.)... They were connected therefore with the place to which the salutations were sent.... St. Paul became acquainted with them at Corinth, during his first visit into Greece. They accompanied him upon his return into Asia; were settled for some time at Ephesus; (Acts 18:18—26.) and appear to have been with St. Paul when he wrote from that place his first epistle to the Corinthians. (1 Cor. 16:19.) Not long after, ... he went from Ephesus into Macedonia, and after "he had gone over those parts," proceeded from thence on his second visit into Greece; during which visit, or rather at the conclusion of it, this epistle was written.... We have, therefore, the time of St. Paul's residence at Ephesus, after he had written to the Corinthians; the time taken up by his progress through Macedonia; and his three months' abode in Greece: we have the sum of these three periods allowed for Aquila and Priscilla going back to Rome, so as to be there when the epistle was written. Now what this leads us to observe, is the danger of scattering names and circumstances in writings like the present; how implicated they often are with dates and places, and that nothing but truth can preserve consistency. Had the notes of time in this epistle fixed the writing of it to any date, prior to St. Paul's first residence at Corinth, the salutation of Aquila and Priscilla would have contradicted the history; because it would have been prior to his acquaintance with these persons. If the notes of time had fixed it during that residence at Corinth; during his journey to Jerusalem when he first returned out of Greece: or during his progress through the Lesser Asia, upon which he proceeded to Antioch; an equal contradiction would have been incurred: because it appears, (Acts 18:2—26.) that during all this time, they were either with St. Paul, or abiding at Ephesus. Lastly, had the notes of time in this epistle, which we have seen to be perfectly incidental, compared with the notes of time in the first epistle to the Corinthians, fixed this epistle to be either contemporary with that, or prior to it, a similar contradiction would have ensued; first, because, when the epistle to the Corinthians was written, Aquila and Priscilla were along with St. Paul: (1 Cor. 16:19.) and because, secondly, the history does not allow us to suppose, that between the time of their becoming acquainted with him, and the writing of that epistle, ... they could have gone back to Rome, so as to have been saluted in an epistle to that city; and then have come to St. Paul at Ephesus, so as to be joined with him, in saluting the church at Corinth. As it is, all things are consistent.' Paley.—The author has transcribed this passage, chiefly to give the less learned reader an idea and a specimen of the manner, in which able critics can, almost in all cases, detect literary forgeries, and establish the authenticity of ancient writing. This is peculiarly needful, in an age of bold infidelity; in which the most confident assertions are made, and suppositions advanced, without the shadow of proof; as if a literary forgery were attended with little difficulty, or danger of detection; when in fact it is nearly the most difficult thing, which can possibly be attempted, and scarcely ever escapes detection.—'St. Paul's contention at Corinth was with unbelieving Jews, who at first, "opposed and blasphemed," and afterwards "with one accord raised an insurrection against him." Aquila and Priscilla adhered, we may conclude, to St. Paul, throughout this whole contest. (Acts 18:) ... It is highly probable, they should be involved in the dangers and persecutions, which St. Paul underwent from the Jews;" ... as they, though Jews, were assisting to him, in preaching to the Gentiles at Corinth. They had taken a decided part, in the great controversy of that day, the admission of the Gentiles to a parity of religious situation with the Jews. For this conduct alone, ... they may seem to have been entitled to thanks, from the churches of the Gentiles.' Paley.

V. 5. The apostle also desired to be remembered with the same expressions of affection to Epenetus: for the words rendered "greet" and "salute," are the same in the original. (3) He was peculiarly beloved by the apostle, having been his first convert in Achaia, and the earnest of his subsequent usefulness. Perhaps he was the first of the household of Stephanus, who embraced the gospel. (1 Cor. 16:15.)

V. 6—15. It is not known what Mary this was; (6) or in what respect she had "bestowed much labour" on the apostle and his friends; but she had, in some proper manner, been very active in providing for their support and comfort. Andronicus and Junia, being Jews, and of the same tribe and family with St. Paul, had on some occasion been imprisoned with him for the sake of the gospel. They had, probably, been converted on the day of Pentecost, or soon after, and were well known and esteemed by the other apostles, even while Paul had been a persecutor: as they "were in Christ," that is, believers before the apostle was; (Marg. Ref. t, x.) and consequently had then been the objects of his scorn and enmity. (Note, 1 John 3:13—15.) Of the persons who are next mentioned, nothing certain is known. Apelles had approved himself to be a true believer, by his exemplary, zealous conduct. Probably, Aristobulus was not a Christian; but he had several in his household, of whom the apostle had some knowledge. Narcissus is supposed to have been a very powerful and wicked man, of whom many things are recorded in the Roman histories: yet he too had believers in his family, probably among his numerous slaves! Rufus seems to have been the son of Simon the Cyrenian; and his mother had showed such attention to Paul, that he deemed her deserving from him of the honour and respect due to a parent. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Mark 15:21. Note, John 19:25—27.)—It is remarkable, that the apostle, amidst all his engagements, should be so well acquainted with the names and characters of many Christians, residing in a city which he had never visited. Most of them, indeed, were such as he had previously been acquainted with; and they formed but a small part of the believers at Rome. Yet this shows his indefatigable diligence, and his attention to every thing relative to the churches of the Gentiles. Xenophon states it as peculiarly admirable in Cyrus, that he so knew all the officers of his numerous army, that, in giving his orders, he addressed each of them by name; and that he made it his study, to be able to do this.—It may also be observed, that the apostle never mentioned the name of Peter, which he doubtless would have done, had Peter then resided at Rome: this powerfully militates against all the traditions of antiquity respecting Peter, on which so enormous a fabric of usurpation and superstition has been erected.—In Christ. (7) Notes, 8:1,2. Is. 45:15—17,23—25. John 6:52—58. 15:2—5. 17:20—23. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. 2 Cor. 5:17. 12:1—6. 1 John 5:20,21.

V. 16. A holy kiss.] Marg. Ref. i.—This expression of spiritual affection, to which the apostle exhorted them, in order to show that his epistle had produced its intended effect in promoting mutual love among them, has been supposed to have been used by men and women separately: yet, as it seems afterwards to have been laid aside, because of abuse or slander, that opinion perhaps is groundless, and rather the effect of modern ideas of propriety, resulting from licentious refinement, than suited to the pure simplicity of those primitive times.—The apostle further informed them, that the several churches of Christ, which he had visited, desired to express their affectionate regard to them.

V. 17—20. The apostle wrote from the fulness of his heart: and therefore, when he seemed to be concluding, his overflowing love induced him to begin again: as a further topic occurred to his mind. Thus he here interrupted his subject, that he might warn the Christians at Rome, to "note" and carefully guard against the persons, whose conduct, doctrine, or insinuations tended to make divisions in the church, or to stumble or mislead inquirers: and to avoid them, as they would persons who were infected with some contagious disease. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) For, whatever they professed, they "did not serve Christ" or seek his glory in what they did: but they rather sought the indulgence of their appetites; and advanced, or zealously contended for, their peculiar opinions, in order to support themselves, and live in plenty, without labour. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Phil. 3: 17—19. 2 Pet. 2:10—19.) Thus, by their benevolent and flattering language, and plausible harangues, they imposed upon the judgment, and insinuated themselves into the affections, of those persons, who were favourably disposed to hear the gospel, but were unsuspecting and undiscerning. (Marg. Ref. r.) Men of this character had done great mischief at Corinth, whence this epistle is supposed to have been written: (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:1—6,13—15.) and he feared lest they should do the same at Rome. The apostle was the more earnest, to caution the Romans against such artful deceivers: because their unreserved "obedience" to the will of Christ was every where spoken of, with great approbation. He was therefore much rejoiced at this good report of them, and desired that it might prevail still more: yet he would have them to be obedient from an established judgment, as well as from a proper disposition of heart: he greatly desired that they might "be wise" and prudent in every good work; and simple and inexperienced only concerning evil, and unacquainted with its painful effects; and thus be harmless and inoffensive. (Marg. Ref. r—x. Notes, Matt. 10:16—18. 1 Cor. 14:20—25.) He knew that Satan, who was permitted to bruise the heel of the Seed of the woman, would annoy them to the uttermost: but their reconciled God, the Author of inward and outward peace, would "shortly bruise" that enemy, and all his agents, "under their feet," and give every believer an entire and final victory over him. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Luke 10:17—20.) He therefore prayed that the pardoning mercy and sanctifying grace of Christ might always be with them. (Marg. Ref. a.)

V. 21—23. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Acts 13:1—3. 16:1—3. 17:5—9. 20:4.)—The apostle, not being an expert writer in the Greek language, generally employed an amanuensis. Tertius, who wrote this epistle has been supposed to be the same person as Silas, or Silvanus; because Silas in Hebrew signifies the Third, as Tertius does in Latin: but this is uncertain, and not very probable. Gaius perhaps was the same person, to whom John addressed his third epistle. (Preface, 3 John.) Being a man of affluence, he hospitably entertained Paul and his company; and he was so liberal in services of this kind, that he might be called "the host of the whole church." Erastus, as the steward, or treasurer, of Corinth, must have been a person of considerable rank, who had embraced the gospel.

V. 25—27. The apostle at length concluded the epistle, with ascribing glory to God in such a manner as to direct the faith and dependence of those whom he addressed, to be placed entirely on him. He was aware that nothing, but the almighty power of God, could preserve them from the fatal assaults of their subtle and potent enemies. But God was able to establish them in the faith, hope, and obedience of the gospel, which had been preached to them; for this accorded to the doctrine of Christ, respecting the salvation of sinners, and the calling of the Gentiles, preached by him in other churches. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) This great mystery had been concealed from mankind in general, since the beginning, and had only been in part revealed to the Jews: but at length it had been openly manifested, according to the writings of the ancient prophets, and by the accomplishment of them; and by the preaching of the gospel, according to the commandment of the eternal God, to his apostles and evangelists: that it might be made known to the nations, in order to deliver them from their idolatries and iniquities, and lead them to "the obedience of faith." (Marg. Ref. p—x. Notes, 1:1—4. Matt. 13:16,17,34,35. 1 Cor. 2:6—13. Eph. 1:9—12. 3:1—12. Tit. 1:1—4.) To this God of infinite wisdom and knowledge, from whom all wisdom originates, all glory and worship ought to be rendered for ever, through his Son Jesus Christ.—By "the only wise God" we must understand the Deity, without respect to the distinction of Persons; or the Father, without excluding the Son or the Holy Spirit; who in many Scriptures are shown to be coequal with the Father, in all divine perfections. But as the Godhead is revealed to us, in and by the incarnate Word, our divine Mediator; so we must in him see the glory of God, and our adoration and worship must in the same way be presented. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. True religion teaches men humbly and frankly to acknowledge their obligations, even to those who in many respects are their inferiors; and "it becometh saints," to receive and be helpful to each other for the Lord's sake, as they have opportunity, and to requite the kindness which has been shown to any of their brethren. Indeed the whole church is under obligations to those, who venture their lives, or lay themselves out, to preserve or asssist the useful servants of Christ. If an apostle so kindly remembered each of those, who had "bestowed labour upon him;" much more will the Lord remember all the services, which have been performed from love to him and the gospel. (Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 25:34—40. Heb. 6:9,10.)—Seniority in faith gives a real precedency; and the bonds of grace are nearer than those of nature.—Christ is as much present in the family worship of those, who meet in his name, as in the more public assemblies of his saints. Believers are often found in those families, of which the principals are unconverted: and they should perform their several relative duties, with cheerfulness and a deference to their superiors, though strangers to the grace of God; (Notes, 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 2:18—25. nor are they on account of their low condition less regarded of beloved by the Lord, or by his faithful and zealous ministers.

V. 17—27. In order to maintain our communion with the Lord and with his saints uninterrupted; those persons must be marked with decided disapprobation, and avoided, who aim to prejudice believers against each other, to draw them off from faithful pastors, or to seduce them into strange doctrines, contrary to the simple truths of God's word. For, notwithstanding their zeal and confidence, as if they alone were the servants of Christ, they evidently do not belong to our "Prince of peace;" but are the slaves of their selfish interests, sensual appetites, or ambition. By their apparent affection and compassion, and by their well-worded declamations, they deceive many hopeful injudicious persons; and few are absolutely secured from their plausible delusions. While, therefore, we give Christians merited commendation for their obedience hitherto; we should use every proper means to render them "wise to that which is good," and to keep them inexperienced "in that which is evil:" as well as to encourage them and ourselves with the assurance, that "the God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly." Every expression of the most endeared affection should be used among believers, but in the most pure and holy manner. —Those who honour Christ by showing kindness to his people, will be honoured by him, having their names written in the book of life.—True religion does not require men to quit public stations; when they can fill them to the glory of God, and the benefit of his church.—Trusting in the power of God, to establish us in the faith and hope of the gospel, thankfully receiving the revelation of the mystery, which was so long kept secret from mankind; endeavouring to make known the gospel "according to the Scriptures of the prophets, and the commandment of the everlasting God," in all parts of the world; and to help all who by scriptural means attempt this, to the utmost of our ability, and with our unceasing prayers: remembering that we are called to the "obedience of faith," and that every degree of true wisdom is from the "only wise God;" we should endeavour, by word and deed, to render glory to him through Jesus Christ; that so "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with us for ever. Amen"

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

THE narrative of the apostle's successful preaching at Corinth, has been considered. (Notes, Acts 18:1—17.) But very soon after he left the church which he founded there, other teachers came thither, who made great pretensions to eloquence, wisdom, and knowledge of Christian liberty; and thus undermined his influence, and the credit of his ministry. By these means, the Corinthians were divided into parties, engaged in eager disputes, and seduced into various irregularities in practice, and errors in doctrine.—'It appears, that this letter to the Corinthians was written by St. Paul, in answer to one which he had received from them, (7:1.) and that the seventh, and some of the following chapters, are taken up in resolving certain doubts, and regulating certain points of order, concerning which the Corinthians had ... consulted him. ... Though ... they had written to St. Paul, requesting his answer and directions, in these points; they had not said one syllable about the enormities and disorders which had crept in among them, and in the blame of which they all shared; but his information concerning these irregularities had come round to him from other quarters, ... by more private intelligence.' Paley. The epistle was therefore written, not only as an answer to the inquiries of the Corinthians by letter; but in order to oppose, and if it could be terminate, the various corruptions, in doctrine and practice, which prevailed, to subvert the influence of the false teachers, and to re-establish the apostle's own authority in that church. By general truths, he, with great address and prudence, made way for a more direct and particular opposition to the several gross irregularities and dangerous mistakes, into which they had been seduced. He stated the truth and will of God in various particulars, with great energy of argument and animation of style: he satisfactorily resolved the several questions which had been proposed to him; he, with great tenderness and wisdom, intermixed exhortations and directions with his other subjects; and he concluded with affectionate and pathetic prayers for them.—Though this epistle is not so systematic as that to the Romans, it is replete with important instruction, and contains the fullest and most interesting declaration and demonstration of the resurrection of believers, in consequence of the resurrection of their Lord, which is any where to be found. (Notes, 15:)—It is most evident, that the epistle was written by the apostle, when residing at or near Ephesus, and some time before he left that city. (Note, 16:5—9.)—Learned men generally calculate, that it was written about A. D. 55, 56, or 57.—'In the ninth year of Claudius, saith Orosius, in the tenth say others, in the twelfth says Dr. Pearson, the Jews were banished from Rome: and St. Paul coming to Corinth, finds Aquila and Priscilla newly come from thence to Corinth on that occasion. (Acts 18:2.) He stays there a year and a half; (11) ... at Ephesus three years, (Acts 20:31.) and at the close of these three years, he writes this epistle. ... If with Dr. Pearson, you begin them only at the twefth of Claudius, they will end in the third of Nero, A. D. 57.' Whitby. But this learned writer has allowed no time for the apostle's voyage, and journey to Jerusalem, and his progress through the churches of Syria, Galatia, and other parts of Asia Minor; and the same oversight has been fallen into by most of those, whom the author has had the opportunity of consulting, who date the epistle so early.—'A. D. 54. Paul at Corinth meets with Aquila and Priscilla. ... A. D. 56. Paul departs from Corinth, and passeth to Ephesus; thence he sets out towards Jerusalem, ... he lands at Cesarea, goes down to Antioch, and comes into the regions of Galatia and Phrygia, confirming the disciples in all these places.—A. D. 57. Paul returns to Ephesus. ... A. D. 60. About this time a schism ariseth in the church at Corinth, which causeth Paul, (now in or about Ephesus,) to write his First Epistle to the Corinthians.' Index to the Quarto Oxford Bible, 1794. The person who compiled this index, seems to place the writing of the epistle subsequent to the tumult at Ephesus, which it certainly was not. (Notes, 16:5—9. 2 Cor. 1:8—11.) It could not, however, be written long before the apostle left Ephesus; and probably the index above quoted does not allow too much time, for the apostle's progress from Jerusalem to Ephesus. (Notes, Acts 18:19—23. 19:8—12.) This computation, therefore, the author has fixed on, as more satisfactory than any other which he has seen.—The epistle contains no express prophecies; but nothing can exceed the decided claim to divine inspiration, which the writer advances. (Notes, 2:6—13.) He either therefore claimed what he was not entiled to; or his epistles are not only genuine and authentic, but divinely inspired. (Preface to the Epistles.)

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes the church at Corinth, 1—3; thanks God for the grace and gifts conferred on the Christians residing there, 4—7; and expresses his confidence respecting their salvation, 8, 9. He exhorts them to unity, and reproves their dissensions, 10—16. "The preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that perish, but the power and wisdom of God," to the salvation of believers, 17—25. To exclude boasting, God has not called the wise, the mighty, or the noble; but the foolish, the weak, and those whom man despises, 26—29. Christ is "made of God," to those who are in him. "Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption," that we may glory in the Lord alone, 30, 31.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Rom. 1:1—4. Gal. 1:1,2.) There was a party at Corinth, who depreciated St. Paul's ministry, and questioned his apostolical authority: it was therefore proper for him to begin his epistle with an express declaration, that he was called, "through the will of God" to that high office in the church: and it was conciliatory and condescending, to join Sosthenes with him, in this salutation and address; as he meant to reprove many evils, which had crept in among the Corinthians. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) It is probable that Sosthenes was one of those, who having been appointed to the ministry, accompanied Paul in his travels. (Note, Acts 18:12—17.) The apostle addresses "the church of God," or the collective body of Christians, at Corinth, as "sanctified in Christ," which some explain of their having been separated, or set apart for God in his eternal purpose, as "chosen in Christ to be saints" or holy persons; others, of their being actually sanctified by the communication of his Spirit. (Marg. Ref. e—h.)—With them he also joined "all that in every place called upon the name of the Lord Jesus;" who was equally the Lord of the apostle, of Sosthenes, and of every believer. It is probable that the apostle immediately referred to the other churches in Achaia. The passage, however, shows how inseparable the invocation of Christ was from the profession of Christianity in those days. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, Acts 2:14—21. 9:10—14. Rom. 10:5—11.) Some would indeed render it "those, who are called by the name of the Lord Jesus:" but it is evidently inconsistent with the proper construction of the Greek language, thus to render it: and this interpretation, we may confidently assert, would never have been adopted, if the previous opposition of men's minds to the divine adoration of Christ had not induced them to have recourse to it: though it must be allowed that some have favoured it, who by no means denied the Deity of Christ.—To them that are sanctified, &c. (2) To explain the terms "sanctified" and "saints," as implying no more than the profession of Christianity, and including all nominal Christians, as many learned men do, would enervate the language of the apostle, and confound the distinction between the form and the power of godliness, which it is his grand object to maintain. No doubt there were unconverted persons, in the several churches, even in those days: but the apostles addressed their epistles to the collective body, according to their profession; thus teaching them what that profession implied: but if they were not truly saints, they were no more intended, than if they had not been called Christians. The arguments by which these learned writers support their opinion, would equally prove, that the worst persons in the church at Corinth, were indeed "the temple of the Holy Spirit," the "temple of the living God," and entitled to all spiritual and eternal blessings, equally with true believers. (3:16. 6:11,19. 2 Cor. 6:16.)—'Even here from the beginning he lays the foundation of his future reasoning: for if the Corinthians, and all other believers, were called by one God, and sanctified in one Christ; if they all had, and owned, the same Lord; whence did the dissensions arise and get strength among them, as if Christ was divided?' Beza.

So Rom. 10:13. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord:" that is, pray, and adhere to Christ. ... And Acts 9:14. "He hath authority to bind all that call upon thy name:" that is, saith he, that publicly own the worship of Christ.' Whitby.

'Is not this to desire for them grace and peace from God the Father, and consequently to pray for it? Why therefore is it not also to desire the same blessings from God the Son? Whitby; and consequently to pray for them.

V. 4—9. (Notes, Phil. 1:3—8.) Before the apostle entered on the immediate subject of his epistle, he endeavoured to conciliate the affections of the Corinthians, by calling to their recollection the benefits which they had derived from his ministry. He continually thanked God on their account, for having bestowed his grace upon them, "through Jesus Christ;" by which they had been turned from idolatry, to the faith of the gospel and the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, Rom. 1:8—12.)—They had also been "enriched by him" with all spiritual gifts, and miraculously enabled to speak in divers languages, and filled with abundant knowledge of divine things, and a ready elocution in speaking of them. As the testimony of Christ had been confirmed among them, by the miracles of the apostle; they too had been enabled to work miracles after they had embraced it: so that they had come behind no other church in any spiritual gift, before the new teachers were known among them. (Marg. Ref. o—t. Note, Gal. 3:1—5.) Thus, they were preparing themselves and each other, as those who waited for the coming of Christ their Lord and Judge; (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, Matt. 25:14—30. Luke 19:11—27. 1 Thes. 1:9,10. Heb. 9:27,28.) By the continued supplies of his grace he would "confirm them to the end" of their course, in the faith and hope of the gospel: that they might be preserved blameless, in their conduct through life; and stand completely justified and sanctified in the day of judgment. (Notes, Phil. 1:9—11. 1 Thes. 5:23—28. Jude 22—25.) This would certainly be the case, if they were what they professed and appeared to be: seeing "God is faithful" to his promises and covenant, which he ratified with them personally, when he effectually called them to be partakers of Christ and all his blessings, and to a life of communion with him. The apostle indeed afterwards intimated his doubts of some of the Corinthians; yet he here addressed them, as being, in the judgment of charity, what they professed to be.—Out of the abundance of his heart he repeats the words, "Our Lord Jesus Christ," so often, that there is a danger of those readers, whose hearts are strangers to the holy affection which occupied that of the apostle, being disgusted with the repetition.—Blameless, &c. (8) 'He calls them blameless, not whom none had ever blamed; but those whom none could justly blame; that is, those who are in Christ Jesus. (Rom. 8:1,33.)' Beza. Certainly neither spotless innocence, nor sinless perfection, nor such a tenor of conduct from their first profession of Christianity, as was wholly unblamable, could be meant: for the apostle blames many things afterwards, which were very general among them; yet their renewal to holiness seems intended, and their conduct as harmless and blameless, at least equally with their justification. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Eph. 5:22—27. Col. 1:21—23.) 'God will make good his promise, ... if you do not fail yourselves.' Hammond. It seems, that the system, which this learned writer adopts, cannot be maintained, without "adding to the word" of God; for he and his coadjutors frequently insert a clause of this kind, as if the inspired writers had forgotten it, and had expressed themselves incautiously! In fact, it is an interpolation, and as such must be rejected. All professed Christians indeed, at Corinth, would not be "kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation;" for some were not true believers; yet all those whom the apostle especially addressed, would thus persevere; namely, "the saints," even those whom God had "called to the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ." V. 10—16. After this conciliatory introduction, the apostle proceeded to the subject, on which he particularly wrote to the Corinthians; and to point out that leading evil which the same thing, and that there be no [a]divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together [b]in the same mind, and in the same judgment.

11 For [c]it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, [d]that there are contentions among you.

12 Now [e]this I say, that every one of you saith, [f]I am of Paul; and I of [g]Apollos; and I of [h]Cephas; and I of Christ.

13 Is [i]Christ divided? [k]was Paul crucified for you? [l]or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

14 I [m]thank God that I baptized none of you, but [n]Crispus and [o]Gaius;

15 Lest any should say that [p]I had baptized in mine own name.

16 And I baptized also the [q]household of Stephanas; besides, I know not whether I baptized any other. [Practical Observations.]

17 For Christ sent me [r]not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: [s]not with wisdom of [t]words, [u]lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect.

18 For [v]the preaching of the cross is [w]to them that perish [x]foolishness; but [y]unto us which are saved it is the power of God.

19 For it is written, [z]I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent.

gave rise to the other evils that he meant to reprove. He besought and exhorted them, by the name, the honour, and the authority of Christ, to cease from "murmurings and disputings;" that they might all join in the same language of faith; avoid all schisms, contentions, or disunion of heart; and be "perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment," as the different members are compacted into one body.—Considering the different capacities, educations, habits, and prejudices of mankind, it seems impossible to avoid all difference of opinion; but it is equally true that fallen men will never on earth "love God with all their heart," and "their neighbours as themselves;" yet the rule and exhortation must not be changed on that account. As we have one rule, and one standard of truth, and one Spirit to be our Teacher; so, in proportion to our humility, simplicity, and diligence, we come to be of "one mind and judgment," in the great concerns of religion: and were we perfect in these things, we should also be perfectly united in sentiment and affection. (Note, Jer. 32:39—41.) This will be the case in heaven; and it will at length be so in a great degree on earth. The nearer we come to it, the more we approximate to perfection: all our divisions arise from a sinful cause, which must not be excused; but while this cause subsists, we should endeavour to bear with each other in respect of it, and so to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4.) Yet we ought continually to pray for the more abundant pouring out of the Spirit of truth and love, on ourselves and all our fellow-Christians, that we may be "perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment."—The apostle gave the Christians at Corinth this seasonable admonition; because he had been informed by those, on whom he could depend, and whom he did not hesitate to mention, that the church in that city was troubled with contentions. They were in a divided state; and he might say, that every one of them was attached to some particular teacher, in opposition to all others. As if one should profess himself to belong to Paul's company; another, to that of the eloquent Apollos; another to Peter, the great Apostle of the circumcision: and as if others professed themselves the disciples of Christ alone, to excuse their disregard for all his ministers! (Marg. Ref. g—m.)—It has been thought, with probability, that the apostle does not mention these names, as really the heads of the parties into which the Corinthians had divided: but in order more emphatically to mark the evil of the thing itself, and the absurdity of dividing the church, out of a disposition inordinately to honour some particular teacher; or to despise faithful ministers, under pretence of honouring Christ. However respectable the names might be, which were thus used, the thing was indefensible; but it would give less umbrage for him to mention himself, Apollos, and Cephas, than expressly to name the false teachers who were the authors of the discord. (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) He therefore demanded of the Corinthians, whether Christ and his salvation, or his mystical body, could be thus divided, and one part set in opposition to another? Had Paul, or had any of their other teachers, acquired a right to them, by atoning for their sins on the cross? Or had any of them been baptized in the name of Paul, as his disciples, who were engaged in all things, without reserve, to be devoted to him and honour him? (Marg. Ref. n—p. Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 5:13—16.) As things had turned out, he was thankful, that he had baptized so few of them; lest his opponents should have averred that he "baptized them in his own name." He could recollect but a few, whom he had baptized; nor was it necessary that he should be immediately inspired with the remembrance of so immaterial a fact: the rest had been baptized by others, according to the appointment of Christ, without any mention of the apostle's name in it, as they very well knew. (Marg. Ref. q—u.)

V. 17—19. Many, supposing the administration of sacraments to be the most honourable part of the ministerial work, have conjectured reasons why St. Paul did not himself baptize the Corinthian converts: but the reason which he assigns entirely subverts their imaginations. Christ did not send his apostle to baptize men in his name: (which outward form might be administered, with equal validity, by those of inferior station and endowments;) but to preach the gospel, which was a far more important and difficult service: so that he left others to baptize those who embraced the truth. (Notes, John 4:1—4, v. 2. Acts 10:44—48, v. 48.) Some indeed of the Corinthians might think, that he was not so competent to preach the gospel, as this declaration seemed to imply: and he readily allowed, that he had not used the "wisdom of words," or those plausible reasonings, rhetorical flourishes, and arts of oratory, which they admired, and by which some teachers fascinated them. For "Christ sent him" to deliver an important message, in plain language: and he was aware that these decorations, instead of giving efficacy to his doctrine, would degrade it, and even "render the cross of Christ of none effect." These studied arts of pleasing would have enervated the solemn, affecting subject, and obscured its glory. If indeed the preacher did not seek his own honour, in the display of these endowments; he would at least excite men's attention to him, and admiration of him, rather than of his message or his Lord; and the Holy Spirit would not accompany the word by his new creating power, when the credit would be given to the instrument, rather than to the Agent. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, 2:3—5. Ex. 4:10—12. 2 Cor. 4:7. 10:7—11.)—In fact, the preaching of salvation for lost sinners, by the ignominous and agonizing crucifixion of the incarnate Son of God, was "foolishness" to all those who continued in the way to destruction. The sensual, the covetous, and the ambitious perceived, that it was incompatible with their favourite pursuits; the Pharisee and the moralist exclaimed against it, as needless, and tending to licentiousness. The scribe, the Sadducee, and the heathen philosopher, each had his reasons for deriding and reviling it; and the antinomian would foolishly suppose that Christ was crucified, to procure for him the license of gratifying his evil propensities. But those who were the saved, by true faith, knew this despised doctrine to be the constituted and most suitable means, by which the power of God effectually wrought, in pulling down the kingdom of Satan, and converting sinners to himself. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, 20—24. Rom. 1:13—16. 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) And, as to the opinion of the wise men of the world, God had declared that he would destroy their wisdom, and bring it to nothing. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 3:18—23. Job 5:12—16. Is. 29:13—16. 44:25—28.)—'Why did the Holy Spirit choose to deliver such important truths, in the barbarous idiom of a few obscure Galileans?' Campbell. The apostle Paul was not one of these 'obscure Galileans:' but is not this highly improper language, concerning inspired writers, who received the gift of tongues immediately from the Holy Spirit? They did not learn barbarous Greek, as Galilean fishermen. They made no claim to elegance; but certainly precision, and perspicuity, and simplicity, are found in their writings in no common degree.—To baptize. (17) Whence did the almost universally prevailing opinion originate, that the administration of sacraments is the peculiar and highest office of the Christian ministry, above even that of preaching the gospel? Perhaps the reader has never thought of asking this question. I have, however, no hesitation in answering, From popery, in its incipient or more matured state: to change by the opus operatum, which the priest alone can perform aright, 'a child of the devil,' into 'a child of God,' which must be the case if baptism be regeneration, or inseparable from it; and to change, in the same

V. 20—24. (Note, Is. 33:17—19.) The philosophers, scribes, and disputers of the world, were in general employed in confuting each other's systems; they scarcely agreed in any thing, except in rejecting and despising the gospel: and it was evident that their wisdom and learning had been of little use to mankind. What indeed had they achieved? What traces of their success, in meliorating the state of the world, could be discovered? Could it be denied, that God had exposed the folly of this kind of wisdom, in the most conspicuous manner? In his infinite wisdom, he had left a great part of the world to follow the dictates of their own boasted reason: and the event had demonstrated, that the wisdom of fallen man was incompetent to find out or retain the knowledge of God his Creator: so that idolatry, atheism, or skepticism, connected with the most extreme wickedness, was the universal effect. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Matt. 11:25,26. Rom. 1:21—32.) When this experiment had been sufficiently tried; "it pleased God" to send forth his apostles and evangelists, to preach that doctrine, which was derided as "foolishness;" and they delivered their message in the most artless and unadorned manner: yet, behold, most wonderful effects followed! Immense multitudes believed the report, were saved from idolatry and iniquities, and became the worshippers and servants of the living God! (Notes, 1 Thes. 1:5—10.) The Jewish scribes indeed, not satisfied with all the demonstrations, from miracles and prophecies, that Jesus was the Messiah, as not savouring his spiritual salvation, demanded "a sign from heaven," and waited for a Messiah, who should "come with outward observation:" (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, Matt. 16:1—4. Luke 17:20—23.) and the Greeks required a doctrine adapted to their philosophy, and supported by reasonings and speculations like that of their noted leaders. But the servants of God "preached Christ crucified:" this was the grand peculiarity of their doctrine, the centre of their instructions, and the topic on which they delighted to expatiate, and by motives deduced from it, they enforced all their exhortations. This doctrine of a crucified Messiah; this testimony, that he, who had been put to death by the rulers of the Jews, as "a deceiver," was their long-expected Deliverer and King, to whom all subjection was due, and from whom all blessings were to be expected, was "a stumbling stone to the Jews," who took offence at it, and persisted in unbelief: while the philosophizing Greeks derided, as the excess of folly, the idea that a Jew, and one whom that despised nation had crucified with ignominy, should be honoured as the Governor and Judge of all mankind, trusted as the only Saviour from everlasting misery, and even adored as the infinite and almighty God. (Marg. Ref. m—p.) But all those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who were "called according to his purpose," (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9:24—29.) not only saw the power of God, in the miracles by which the gospel was confirmed in the resurrection of Christ, and in the accomplishment of ancient prophecies; and his wisdom in the glorious plan of redemption, as harmoniously honouring all the divine perfections and magnifying the divine law: but they experienced Christ to be "the Power of God and the Wisdom of God," to deliver them from the bondage of sin, and to make them "wise unto salvation;" and they clearly discerned that he and his gospel were the grand medium by which the power and wisdom of God were displayed; in the subversion of Satan's kingdom of idolatry and sin, and in confounding all the subtle devices of him and his servants. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, Eph. 3:9—12. 1 John 5:9,10,19—21.)

V. 25. Those doctrines and dispensations of God, which proud and presumptuous men decry as foolish and weak, are immensely superior in wisdom, and more efficacious than all which man ever could devise or attempt for the same or similar purposes. Thus the doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Jew, which appeared to the carnal mind a foolish device; and the preaching of it, by unlearned and obscure persons, which appeared a weak expedient; had, by the power of God accompanying it, done more in a few years, towards making men wise and holy, than all the learning and sagacity of Jewish scribes and Pagan philosophers, or the power of armed legislators, had ever been able to effect, or ever would have effected to the end of time. (Marg. Ref. P. O. Josh. 6:1—14. Judg. 7:16—25.)

The foolishness.] Το μωρον. 27. Μωρια. See on 18.—The weakness.] Το ασθενες. 28. "That which is foolish:" "that which is weak."

V. 26—31. The persons, who had been converted to Christianity, and then sent forth to preach the gospel, were a living demonstration of what the apostle inculcated. This the Corinthians might see for themselves: for as the gospel had not been preached to them "with wisdom of words," or with a display of learning and philosophy, but very few of the sages, politicians, mighty princes, or warriors, or of the noble and honourable of the earth, had embraced it. They had perhaps heard a few instances of this kind, in which the omnipotence of divine grace had been displayed. (Notes, Matt. 19:23—26. Jam. 2:5—7.) The persons, however, whom God had employed in preaching the gospel, seem especially intended; and the words, "are called," which seem to favour the other interpretation, are not in the original. (Marg Ref. u, x. Notes, Ps. 8:2. Matt. 11:25,26. 21:14—16. 2 Cor. 4:7. P. O. 7—12.) The apostles, and evangelists, and other ministers, whom God had chosen to publish his salvation to mankind, were not in general called to that service from the schools of the learned, from the courts of princes, or from noble families and eminent stations. On the contrary, they were men whom the world counted "foolish," because not remarkable for eminent talents, and because destitute of human learning: and indeed, such persons were selected for this purpose, that by them God might confound the proud reasonings and scornful objections of heathen philosophers and Jewish Rabbies. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, Matt. 4:18—22. P. O. 12—25. Note, Acts 4:13—22.) He had chosen "the weak things of the world," namely, men of low birth and mean circumstances, unarmed, unlettered fishermen, tentmakers, and others destitute of authority, power, and influence, not previously renowned for courage and vigour of mind; but gentle and mild in their deportment; that having endued them with heavenly wisdom and strength, and enabled them to confirm their testimony by stupendous miracles; he might, by their holy lives and heroic constancy, their patient sufferings and successful labours, put to shame and confound the mighty of the earth. God had even chosen "the base things of the world," even some, who had previously been of immoral characters, and disreputable professions; that being made wise, holy, and useful in the ministry, by his grace and blessing, they might confound and astonish those, who formerly counted them even beneath contempt. (Notes, Matt. 9:9—13.) Nay, he had raised up eminent ministers from among the Gentiles, who, in the proud language and sentiments of the Jews, were considered as scarcely existing, in respect of God and religion; that he might by them confound and bring which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and [f]things which are not, [g]to bring to naught things that are:

the scribes, Pharisees, and unbelieving Jews. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) In short the Lord had ordered every thing, respecting the conversion of sinners, the preachers of the gospel, the plan of redemption, and the way of acceptance, in such a manner, as to give no one of the human species any ground of boasting or "glorying in his presence;" either in respect of abilities, learning, noble birth, privileges, achievements, moral character, or natural good dispositions; or any other distinction, either before or after conversion. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, 4:6,7. Rom. 3:27,28. 2 Cor. 10:17,18.) Why then should the Corinthians so value these endowments in their teachers, when God had evidently poured contempt on them?—Even that distinction, in which alone they might glory, was not in any respect of themselves. By the gratuitous choice and regenerating grace of God, through faith they, sinners of the Gentiles, were "in Christ Jesus," who, by his appointment and free mercy was "made," or become, to all believers the whole of salvation. For they being in themselves ignorant, foolish, guilty, polluted, enslaved, and condemned; Christ was constituted to each of them. "Wisdom;" that, by his word and Spirit, and from his fulness, and "treasures of wisdom and knowledge," they might receive that instruction and counsel, which would render them "wise unto salvation," and fit for every service to which they were called: (Notes, Col. 2:1—4,8—10.) "and Righteousness," that being justified by his obedience unto death imputed to them, and "made the righteousness of God in him," they might possess a title to eternal life: (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26, v. 22. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21.) "and Sanctification," that, by the power of the Spirit of Christ, they might be at length renewed to his image, and made perfect in holiness, and meetness for their heavenly inheritance: "and Redemption," that, by his power and grace, being delivered from the bondage of sin and Satan, they might at length be completely rescued from all remains and traces of this hateful slavery, and be saved from the condemnation and all the consequences of sin; till, by the redemption of the body from the grave, "death itself should be swallowed up in everlasting victory." (Marg. Ref. e—h.) Thus, they who "gloried, might glory in the LORD," (Jer. 9:23,24.) in his special favour, all-sufficient grace, and inestimable salvation; though in themselves they had nothing to glory in, but every thing to be ashamed of.—Here again the apostle refers to Jesus, "the LORD our Righteousness and Strength," what the prophet had spoken of JEHOVAH. (Notes, Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 9:23,24. 23:5,6. Rom. 14:10—12. Gal. 6:11—14, v. 14.)—'They who say, that Christ is made our Righteousness by his righteousness imputed to us, have the same reason to say also, that he is made our Wisdom, by his wisdom imputed to us, &c.' Whitby. There might be some weight in this objection, if this were the only passage of Scripture, by which those who hold "imputed righteousness" prove their doctrine; if there were any other passages in the sacred oracles, which even seem to countenance the notion of imputed wisdom, or sanctification, or redemption; and if the nature of the case were not essentially different. Another may pay my debt, and allow me to receive the wages which he has earned, or the reward to which his services entitle him: thus his payment and his labour may be set down to my account, or imputed to me for my adequate advantage: but who can have wisdom, health, or liberty, by imputation? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The true "church of God" comprises all those, in every place, who are "sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints;" who call on him as "God manifest in the flesh," for all the blessings of salvation; and who acknowledge and obey him as their Lord, and the Lord of all saints, of all men, and of all creatures: and it includes no other persons. In behalf of all such, we should pray continually for an increase of "grace and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ;" we should "thank God, for the grace bestowed on them by Jesus Christ;" with an especial remembrance to those, with whom we are more immediately connected; and we should rejoice in those gifts and that knowledge, by which "the testimony of Christ is confirmed among them." But ministers, with a mixture of authority and affection, should remind their flocks, that an account must be given of all their advantages at the coming of Christ, and call on them daily to wait and prepare for that event. He will "confirm" his true disciples "unto the end," and they may confidently trust in him to "preserve them blameless to that day," and to "present them faultless, before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy." But many appear to be Christians, and are endued with useful gifts, who have not been "called to the fellowship of Christ;" it is therefore highly proper to exhort all who profess the gospel, to prove the reality of their faith, and the "sincerity of their love;" and to "wait for the coming of their Lord," by watchfulness, diligence, and a careful improvement of their talents.—How striking is the contrast between the language of the apostle in these verses, and that of many modern divines! The name of the Lord Jesus Christ was to him the sweetest melody, or "as ointment poured forth:" (Note, Cant. 1:3.) they seem to fear nothing so much as a too frequent, or too honourable mention of him! and, whatever repetitions they may fall into, they will be sure to offend no man, by too often enlarging upon his dignity and condescension, his love and atoning sufferings, his character and offices, his righteousness and salvation. (Note, 2:1,2.)

V. 10—16. Satan has always endeavoured to stir up strife among Christians, as one of his grand devices against the gospel: we should therefore use all our influence to prevail with our brethren by the name, and for the honour of our common Lord, to avoid contests of every kind, and as much as possible to "speak the same thing, and to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment;" and we should persevere in praying for this most desirable harmony, and endeavour to promote it. For it must greatly pain every serious and judicious believer, to see or hear of the divisions which take place, through the spiritual pride, ambition, selfishness and malignant passions, of turbulent and designing men; and through the prejudices, instability, want of judgment, love of novelty, and eager spirit of some real believers. Thus the church is divided into parties; congregations are distracted by intestine contentions; and men are drawn away from their faithful pastors, to rank themselves under the banners of some confident deceiver, who "privily brings in damnable heresies;" couched in plausible language, propagated under specious pretences, and varnished over by an ingenuity, which might have been far better employed. Thus, professed Christians become 'the disciples of men:' and, regardless of the apostle's expostulations, they still glory in ranking themselves among the followers of this or the other preacher: as if "Christ were divided!" or as if that teacher, whom they extol, while they despise others, had been "crucified for them," or "they had been baptized into his name," and vowed to be 'his faithful soldiers unto their lives' end!' We should be very thankful, if we have been preserved from giving sanction or occasion to such disgraceful contests; we should carefully avoid all appearance of seeking our own credit, instead of the glory of Christ; (Note, 2 Cor. 4:5,6.) and pray continually for "the meekness of wisdom," that we may know how to counteract the pestilent endeavours of the firebrands of the church, without giving them any handle or plausible pretence against us.

V. 17—25. Those whom Christ sends to "preach his gospel" are often incapable, and should never be studious, of "that wisdom of words," which men of education and ingenuity, but of a worldly spirit, admire; nor should the hearers of the gospel look for such worthless decorations of that divine doctrine, which is most beautiful in its native simplicity. Too often "the cross of Christ is rendered of none effect," through the vain affectation of the preachers, to recommend it by the studied graces of elocution, or the ostentatious parade of learning and philosophy. Thus its edge is blunted, its convincing plainness is obscured, its genuine beauty and glory are tarnished; the preacher has his worthless reward, in human applause or useless popularity. (Note, Matt. 6:1—4.) But the Spirit of God disdains to set his seal to the word thus preached; it proves the mere shadow of a feast, at which the guests are starved; and an amusing display of ingenuity, instead of an assault on "the strong holds" of Satan by the power of divine truth. Indeed, all attempts, to make the real gospel palatable to worldly men, must

CHAPTER II.

The apostle declares, that he had not come among the Corinthians "with excellency of speech and wisdom," but had preached Christ crucified, with plainness and humble diffidence; that their "faith might stand in the power of God" alone, 1—5. The gospel contains the hidden "wisdom of God" in bringing men to glory, which could not be discovered by any human sagacity, 6—9; but God by his Spirit had revealed it, 10—13. "The natural man" cannot receive it, because it is spiritually discerned: but "he that is spiritual" judgeth all things, "and is judged of no man," 14—16.

unsuccessful: it always was, and always will be, "foolishness" to such as are in the road to destruction: and the only way to render it inoffensive, is to leave out, or but slightly touch on, the offensive parts of it: and this is too commonly done, when preachers study to embellish their doctrine and recommend themselves, by "the wisdom of words, or the excellency of speech." But the true minister of Christ is no "man-pleaser:" he will with "great plainness of speech" deliver his whole message, however it may be derided or reviled; that by it, as a sure touchstone, men may learn their real state and character. Thus, while to numbers it appears foolish, to "those who are saved" it proves "the power of God." It is his determination to "destroy the wisdom of the wise, and to bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent;" he will not honour carnal weapons, or self-sufficient teachers; he will pour contempt on carnal wisdom; and will abase, either in deep humiliation, or final destruction, all the learned scribes, the wise philosophers, and the eager "disputers of this world." Such persons are indeed commonly found among the despisers or opposers of the doctrine of Christ crucified; but what have they ever done towards rendering the world wise and holy? Or what have they to propose so excellent, as to merit a preference to that gospel which they reject, or even to bear a comparison with it? Undeniable facts evince the folly of this wisdom; and show that, amidst all the displays of the "eternal power and Godhead," with which we are surrounded, human reason, sagacity, and learning know him not, but uniformly lead men to idolatry, impiety, or infidelity: and on the other hand "it hath pleased God," from age to age by "the foolishness of preaching," (the despised doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Saviour, God in human nature, "purchasing the church with his own blood," delivered with unadorned simplicity,) to save multitudes, even all that believe, from ignorance, delusion and vice; and to make them meet for his heavenly kingdom. For the true minister of God insists especially upon this great doctrine, which is no less a stumblingblock to some, and foolishness to others at present, than it was in the apostle's days: but which is known and experienced to "be the wisdom and power of God" to all, who partake of the high and gracious calling of God in Christ Jesus.

V. 26—31. There is scarcely a stronger demonstration of man's depravity, blindness, and folly, than this circumstance; that neither facts nor arguments can repress his arrogance in treating the wisdom of God manifested in the gospel as "foolishness," the power of God as "weakness;" though no human devices or efforts have ever produced effects in the least comparable to those, which have been and are even now wrought by it. Let them then call it folly, enthusiasm, weakness, madness, or what they please: may we show in our lives, that it is a wise, holy, and blessed doctrine; and we shall feel in our hearts that it gives "a peace of God, which passeth all understanding." And though we see, as those before us did, that but "few of the wise, the mighty, the noble of this world" are called to the knowledge of the truth, or employed to promote the cause of righteousness; yet we may perceive also, that God employs the foolish, weak, despised, and ignoble of this world, to confound the devices, and expose the folly of the wise, to disappoint the designs of the mighty, and to disgrace and bring into contempt "the honourable of the earth:" so that in every thing he takes care, that no flesh should glory in his presence.—But let us not fear, knowing how foolish, guilty, polluted, and enslaved we are in ourselves; for by deep convictions of this kind the Holy Spirit leads poor sinners to believe in Christ, who "of God" and by his special grace "is made to them Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption:" so that having all in him, they may be satisfied to have nothing as of themselves; and when most covered with shame, and filled with deep remorse and self-abhorrence, they may yet "glory in the Lord and his salvation;" and hope to glorify him on earth, and to be preserved as monuments of his love, to praise and glorify him for ever in his heavenly felicity.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. When the apostle came, as a Jewish stranger, among the polite, speculating, and licentious Corinthians; he did not attempt to catch their attention by affected elegance or sublimity of language, by the trappings of human oratory, or by the plausible reasonings of philosophy. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) For it was his sole object to declare "the testimony of God," concerning the only way of salvation from eternal misery, and of obtaining eternal life; and a message of such immense importance would not admit of these worthless embellishments. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Ps. 19:7—11. 119:2,3. Is. 8:20. John 3:27—36. 1 John 5:9—12.) Whatever knowledge he therefore possessed, either of Rabbinical or Grecian learning, he "determined" to keep it out of sight; and to preach, as if he had known no other subject than that of Jesus the Messiah, even him who was crucified, and who was generally despised and execrated; and those things which related to redemption for sinners through his blood. This was the centre and substance of his preaching: but it is evident, that he did not confine himself wholly to this one topic, so as to exclude other parts of the revealed truth and will of God. For we are sure, from his own writings, that he preached man's relation to God, as his Creator, Benefactor, and Governor; the glorious perfections and the holy law of God; the future judgment and eternal state of righteous retributions; the lost estate of man, regeneration, repentance, conversion, the necessity of personal holiness, attention to relative duties; and in short "the whole counsel of God," as the great circumference to that circle, of which "Christ crucified" is the centre, in which all the lines meet. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, 1:20—24. Acts 20:18—21,25—27.) But, upon the most mature deliberation, he had "determined to know nothing," even among the refined and philosophical Corinthians, which did not elucidate, recommend, evince, or adorn, this great doctrine of salvation by the cross of Christ.—Declaring. (1) The apostle came as a messenger simply to deliver a message, even "the sure testimony of God," without alteration, omission, decoration, or addition; the whole of what he was sent to deliver, nothing more, and in all simplicity.—'What extraordinary claims are advanced,—what pretensions made in this chapter!—How pointed is it upon the subject of inspiration! If the sacred writers were in any degree true men, they were then fully inspired in all which they taught concerning religion. The miracles which they wrought prove them true men, whatever their pretensions might be, and their own words show what these pretensions were.'

With excellency of speech. (1) Καθ' ὑπεροχην λογου. 4. 1:17,18. ὑπεροχη, 1 Tim. 2:2. Not elsewhere. Ab ὑπερεχω, emineo.—Declaring.] Καταγγελλων. 9:14. 11:26. Acts 4:2. 13:5. Rom. 1:8, et al. Καταγγελευς. Acts 17:18.—I determined. (2) Εκρινα. Acts 15:19.

V. 3—5. In adhering to his determination, the apostle had been deeply sensible of his own weakness and insufficiency, and aware of the prejudices and opposition which he had to encounter: and he was even oppressed with much "fear and trembling," lest his infirmity should prevent his success, or disgrace his glorious doctrine. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Acts 18:1—17. 2 Cor. 10:7—11. 12:7—10. Gal. 4:12—16.) He had therefore acted among the Corinthians with much diffidence, modesty, and meekness; and without any thought of making himself the head of a party, as some of their present teachers did. His address and style of preaching had been entirely devoid of "the persuasive words of man's wisdom," which often seduces men into error, and entices them into the views of designing orators, by moving the passions, impressing the imagination, and imposing on the judgment. On the contrary, he left the success of it to be produced entirely "by the demonstration of the Spirit," and the exertion of his divine power. Many expositors understand this exclusively of the miracles, by which the Holy Spirit powerfully demonstrated the truth of the gospel, or the prophecies which were fulfilled in those things, which the apostles preached concerning Jesus and his salvation: but these proofs, however conclusive, without the internal operation of the Holy Spirit, as the author of divine life in regeneration, would not have produced true faith; and it is unreasonable to confine the language to those operations, which were peculiar to one age, and to exclude such as are alike necessary, and alike to be depended on, in every age. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, 1 Thes. 1:5—8. 2:13—16.) The annexed reason, however, puts it beyond all reasonable doubt, that the latter were principally intended: for the apostle would use no other arts of persuasion, than that plain and faithful address to the hearts and consciences of men which the Spirit of God always makes use of in convincing them of sin, and in powerfully demonstrating the truth and preciousness of the gospel to their souls: because he would not have their "faith to stand on the wisdom of men, but on the power of God." (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, 1:17—19. 2 Cor. 4:7.) Now that faith, which is produced by outward miracles, and wholly rests on them, is no more saving, or to be depended on than that, which is the effect of logical reasonings or eloquent persuasions: (Notes, Acts 8:9—24.) but the faith which is the effect of the inward and powerful teaching and "demonstration of the Spirit," rests on the power of God, and is supported by it; and will endure through all trials even to the end.

V. 6—9. The apostle disclaimed all pretensions to human wisdom, or learning; yet he would not allow his preaching to be really "foolishness." (Notes, 1:20—25.) Indeed, he, and other faithful ministers, "spake wisdom among those who were perfect;" that is, who were so matured in judgment, experience, and spirituality, as to be able to receive it. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Phil. 3:12—16. Heb. 5:11—14.) To persons of this description they laid open the rich treasures of the wisdom of God, in his method of saving sinners, and in the dispensations of providence: and thus they excited their admiring adoration: and rendered them wise and intelligent in divine things, and, in respect of their true interest and whole duty, far beyond all other persons in the world. If, therefore, the Corinthians had not been initiated into the depths of this divine wisdom, it was because they were not proper recipients of them. (Note, 3:1—3.) But this wisdom was totally distinct from "the wisdom of this world," and even in many things contrary to it, and to that of its princes and rulers; whose sagacity and policy could not prevent the speedy termination of all their grandeur, and their everlasting ruin, or that of their subjects and flatterers. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) For it was "the wisdom of God in a mystery," even in the mysterious design of glorifying his holy name and all his perfections, in the redemption of sinners, by the incarnation, righteousness, atoning sacrifice, and mediation of his coequal Son. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—12. 1 Tim. 3:16.) This was ordained and intended by him, "before the world began," in order to bring his chosen people to everlasting glory: but it had been entirely hidden from men, except as made known by revelation, and as faith simply received that information. So that the Gentiles with all their philosophical speculations, knew nothing of this wisdom; the unbelieving Jews, and their most learned scribes were wholly unacquainted with it: the Mosaic dispensation had only conveyed some general intimations of it: but the gospel had now discovered it more fully to all who were brought to embrace it. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) Yet "none of the princes," or great men in the world's estimation had known any thing of it: nay, their policy was diametrically opposite to it. For had Pilate, Herod, Caiaphas, or the Jewish rulers, understood this divine mystery; they would, at least by fear, have been restrained from crucifying "the Lord of glory," that divine Person, who, even when he hung upon the cross, was the Lord and "King of glory," God in human nature, the Governor and Judge of all the world. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, Ps. 24:7—10. Jam. 2:1—4, v. 1.) Thus the prophecies had been accomplished; and what had of old been written by Isaiah might be applied to the glorious redemption now proclaimed to mankind, and to the blessings conferred on those, and prepared for those, who were taught by the grace of the gospel to love and obey God; and which far exceeded all that had been seen, heard, or thought of by men. V. 10—13. The apostles in general, and Paul in particular, had not discovered the mystery of divine wisdom, by their own superior sagacity: but "God had revealed it to them by his Spirit;" who not only searched all hearts, but was intimately acquainted with "the deep things of God," and all the inmost counsels of his infinite mind. For as no man can penetrate the recesses of another's understanding and heart, and know the whole of his thoughts and intentions in the same way, that his own soul is conscious of them; so none can know, discover or comprehend the things of God, but his own infinite spirit; who is One with the Father and the Son, in the unity of the Godhead, and whose office it is to reveal divine mysteries to his church. (Marg. Ref. y—d. Note, Matt. 11:27.)—This should be specially noted as a most decisive testimony both to the Deity and personality of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 12:4—11. John 14:15—17,25,26. 15:26,27. 16:8—11. Acts 5:1—11, vv. 3,4,9. 13:1—5, vv. 2,4.) —Now the apostles had not "received the spirit of the world;" they were not actuated by those wordly principles, nor guided by that carnal prudence, of which Satan, "the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience," is in one way or other the concealed author: but they were inspired and actuated by "the Sprit of God," that they might know, and communicate to the church the things which God most freely bestows on all believers. These they declared, not in such words as man's wisdom would have employed, but in simple plain language, dictated by the Holy Spirit: (Note, 3—5.) which sacred style was formed by comparing one part of divine revelation with another; the spiritual nature of redemption with the holiness of the divine character and law; the former discoveries of the truth and will of God, with these later revelations; the types and prophecies, with their accomplishment; and the remedy proposed, with the state of mankind, and their need of it. (Marg. Ref. e—k.) Thus their spiritual meditations, discoveries, and affections, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, led them to use a solemn, energetic, and faithful method of speaking, which accorded to the majesty and importance of their subject, and the style of the sacred oracles; but totally differed from the affected oratory and enticing words of man's wisdom.—The apostle here undoubtedly speaks of himself as divinely inspired, both in what he preached, and in what he wrote. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12, v. 12.)—'From this and the preceding verses, as also from the following, it is exceeding evident, that the apostles spake and wrote by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as did the prophets of old time, and delivered only such things as from God, which God revealed to them by the Holy Spirit, according to those words of St. Peter: "We preach the Gospel to you, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven."' Whitby.—Probably Silvanus and Timothy also had immediate revelations from God. Others, who preach the same grand truths, have them only by mediate revelation; and the doctrine of all uninspired preache s must be assayed by that of the apostles. (Note, Matt. 16:19.)

V. 14—16. It was not to be expected that the faithful and solemn preaching of the gospel would please mankind in general; as "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him." (Marg Ref. m—o.) The term here used has occasioned much disputation: but, as it is derived from a word which sometimes at least signifies the rational soul; it may be supposed to have reference to the powers of his mind, as well as to his inferior inclinations.— "is opposed to the regenerate man, and to the glorified, that is, the perfectly regenerated, man. A man that hath only natural abilities and perfections.' Leigh. One that has not the Spirit of God.—The apostle's argument absolutely requires, that by "the natural man" we understand the unregenerate man, however sagacious, learned, or abstracted from sensual indulgences: for he opposes him to the spiritual man; and the pride of carnal reasoning is at least as opposite to spirituality, as the most grovelling sensuality can be. (Notes, Gal. 5:19—26.) No man, as naturally born into the world, and not supernaturally born again of the Spirit, "can see the kingdom of God," or receive, in faith and love, the spiritual mysteries of redemption by the cross of Christ. (Notes, John 3:3—8. 14:15—17.) To all unregenerate men, these things will, in one way or other, appear "foolishness," uninteresting, unnecessary, inconsistent, or absurd: and doubtless proud reasoners have scoffed at them, more than ever mere sensualists did. (Notes, 1:20—25.) No ingenuity, address, or reasoning of the preacher can prevent this effect; no application of the man's own mind, except in humble dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, can enable him to perceive the real nature and glory of them. "For they are spiritually discerned," that is, by the illuminating and sanctifying work of the Spirit of God upon the mind; by which a spiritual capacity is produced, which discerns, admires, loves, and delights in the divine excellency of heavenly things. When this change has taken place, and a man's spiritual senses have been matured by growth and exercise, he may be called "a spiritual man;" and he perceives the spiritual glory and excellency of every truth and precept in the word of God; he distinguishes one object from another by a spiritual taste, or a kind of extemporaneous judgment, and so he becomes a competent judge in these matters. Yet his views, principles, and motives do not fall under the judgment of any other men: none are competent to decide on the propriety of his conduct, as they are strangers to those views and discoveries, which direct his determinations. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Note, Acts 16:1—3. P. O. 1—12.) For "who hath known the mind of the Lord," or can be capable of "instructing him" who is inspired by the Holy Spirit? As therefore the apostle, and other inspired persons, were made acquainted with "the mind of Christ," by whom the Father reveals himself to men: none of those who presumed to judge them could be competent to decide, either upon their doctrine, or their manner of communicating it. They were, in the very order of things, above such instructers or censurers, who could not possibly understand the principles on which they acted. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. s, t.) In a measure, all "spiritual" men "have the mind of Christ," and unregenerate men are incompetent judges of their conduct: yet this is in every thing to be tried by the word of God; and nothing must be justified or excused, which does not accord with that rule, when properly explained. But the inspired apostles were employed to state that "mind of Christ," by which men's principles and actions must be judged, both at present, and at the day of judgment; and, in this respect they could not be liable to be judged by any man.—Some indeed explain the last verse, as an inquiry whether any man had so known the mind of the Lord, as to be competent to give him any counsel or instruction. (Notes, Rom. 11:33—36.) But the context rather fixes the meaning to the preceding interpretation; and the apostle intended to expose the absurdity of a "natural" man presuming to instruct "a spiritual man," in respect of "spiritual things!" or of an ordinary Christian or teacher presuming to censure or dictate to an inspired apostle, as he thus declared himself to be! It is probable that he had in mind the words of the prophet Isaiah; but he does not expressly quote them. (Note, Is. 40:12—17.) "The mind of Christ," is "the mind of the Lord."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. How surprising is it, that this most honoured servant of Christ should be constrained to justify his divinely excellent and useful preaching, even to the very persons who had been converted by it! But this surprise should be connected with a pleasing and grateful admiration of the divine wisdom, in taking occasion from that circumstance to give the church most valuable instructions, concerning the best method of "declaring the testimony of God" to sinners. This requires no "excellency of speech" or of wisdom to enforce it; but appears most venerable, when the witness for God is regardless of human applause or censure; when his whole soul is occupied, by zeal for the honour of his Lord, and compassion for perishing sinners: when he is willing even among the learned and polite, to be counted ignorant in other respects; when "he determines to know nothing but Christ crucified," and the gracious message which he is sent to deliver in his name.—But if this arduous service made even this great apostle to fear and tremble, through conscious weakness; what reason have we to be humble and diffident, when called to declare the same testimony to mankind! (Note, 2 Cor. 2:14—17.) How should we fear disgracing this honourable ministry, by our own folly or sin! At what a distance should we keep from all ambition and self-confidence! How carefully should we remember that all "our sufficiency is of God" alone! Such humility and meekness adorn, and give dignity to, that holy constancy and boldness, with which we ought to plead the cause of God: and a realizing sense of eternal things, of the worth of souls, the awful danger of ungodly men, the preciousness of Christ, and the importance of our message, will counteract our natural propensity to shrink from "declaring the whole counsel of God," to trifle, or to affect "the enticing words of man's wisdom." The more deeply we are convinced, that no arguments or eloquence of man can by their own efficacy produce saving faith; the greater care we shall take to speak in a plain, serious, and scriptural manner; and in imitation of those preachers of old, whose word was attended with "demonstration of the Spirit and of power;" depending singly on his effectual operation to bring our hearers to believe to the salvation of their souls. The maxims of "human wisdom," whether philosophical or political, will soon "come to naught," and sink into contempt. But experienced believers are made acquainted with such glorious displays of wisdom, as eclipse all that they before admired; even as the rising sun obscures the glimmering lamp. The things which "God ordained before the world," in order to bring his chosen people to glory, are such as "angels desire to look into:" they give the humbled and enlightened mind those views of God, and his perfections, works and ways, which fix it in astonishment, excite it to adoration, inspire it with love and gratitude, raise it above this earthly clod, and all its puny concerns; and enlarge it into the most holy, exalted, yet humble ambition after true honour and greatness. But this wisdom must still be "hidden" from the proud, the carnal, and the unbelieving, notwithstanding the fulness and clearness with which it is revealed in the gospel.—The same principles, which influenced "the princes of the world" to "crucify the Lord of glory," still possess the minds of men in general: and avarice, sensuality, or pride and ambition of worldly honour and distinction, still lead men to despise those good things which "God hath prepared for them that love him," though "they pass man's understanding,' and infinitely excel in glory and value whatever he has seen or heard, or can possibly imagine. They "are prepared for those who love God:" (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31, v. 28. 1 John 4:19.) nor can we know ourselves to be of this number, except as we are conscious that we do "love God," and desire and endeavour constantly to keep his commandments.

V. 10—16. No man truly understands or properly values divine revelation, except that divine Spirit, "who searcheth all things, even the deep things of God," and who revealed them to the apostles, removes the veil from his heart, and enables him to perceive their real excellency. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Cor. 3:7—18.) On this great Teacher we must simply depend, while we seek to know "the things that are freely given by God" to his people, and to obtain the assurance that we belong to that favoured company. If indeed we are delivered from "the spirit of the world," and are taken under the guidance of "the Spirit of God;" we shall more and more regard the words of the sacred Scripture; and, "comparing spiritual things with spiritual," our holy discernment will increase, and we shall acquire a faculty in speaking on religious subjects in language in some degree suited to their divine nature and infinite importance. But whoever teaches, or what language soever is employed; "the natural man" will

CHAPTER III.

The apostle shows, that he could not impart to the Corinthians the deeper mysteries of the gospel, because they were carnal, 1–3; as it appeared from their dissensions, 4. All true ministers are servants to one Lord, 5; who employs them in cultivating his field, and in building his temple, and who alone renders their labours successful, 6–9. The apostle had laid the only true Foundation, and others should take care what they build on it: for their work would be tried as by fire, 10–15. Christians are the temple of God, and it would be extremely perilous to defile that temple, 16, 17. Worldly wisdom is foolishness with God: and none ought to glory in men; for all things belong to those who are Christ's, 18–23.

AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you [a]as unto spiritual, but [b]as unto carnal, even as unto [c]babes in Christ.

2 I have [d]fed you with milk, and not with meat: [e]for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

3 For ye are yet carnal: [f]for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and [g]divisions, are ye not carnal, [h]and walk [i]as men?

4 For while one saith, [k]I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, [l]but ministers by whom ye believed, [m]even as the Lord gave to every man?

6 [l]I have planted, [m]Apollos watered; but [n]God gave the increase.

7 So then, [o]neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.

8 Now [p]he that planteth and he that watereth are one: [q]and every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.

9 For [r]we are labourers together with God: [s]ye are God's [t]husbandry, [u]ye are God's building.

either oppose, despise, or pervert "the things of the Spirit of God;" he cannot cordially receive or rightly understand them: they will remain foolishness to him, because he is destitute of spiritual discernment. On the other hand, he who is "born of God," however destitute of genius and learning, will become spiritual and capable of discerning the harmony and glory of divine truth: he will experience its sanctifying effects in his heart, and produce correspondent fruits in his life. His judgment and conduct will be formed upon the word of God; and those who presume to judge, condemn, or deride him, for violating the maxims of worldly wisdom, will only show their own ignorance and arrogance. They cannot instruct him "in spiritual things," by carnal reasonings: they have "known the mind of the Lord" Jesus, or they would not condemn him for acting according to it: and they can no more argue him out of his principles, experience, hope or duty, than a man with good eyes could be convinced that there is no light from the sun, or that light is neither pleasant or profitable, by the ingenious sophisms of a man who has been blind from his birth. (Notes, Ps. 25:14. P. O. John 9:24—41. Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10. Rev. 2:17.)

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—3. Many of the Corinthians had been seduced into a mean opinion of the apostle's ministry, because he had not fully instructed them in those abstruse subjects, on which some of their teachers had particularly insisted, and about which they plausibly speculated: he therefore here assigns the reason of his conduct in this respect. Though they had been plenteously endued with supernatural gifts and knowledge: (Note, 1:4—9.) yet he had observed those things in their disposition and conduct, which rendered it improper for him to speak to them as to "spiritual" men, who were competent to receive the deeper discoveries of divine wisdom: and thus he was constrained to address them "as carnal, even as babes in Christ." (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 2:14—16. Matt. 16:21—23, v. 23. Rom. 7: 13,14.) For though he looked on them in general as sincere converts, and thus in a measure "spiritual," yet, even till he left them, they were so far from maturity of judgment and experience, and so prone to carnal passions, that he deemed it incumbent on him "to feed them with milk," as the nurse does the infant, "and not with strong meat," which they could not digest. (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) The simplest truths of the gospel, respecting the sinfulness of man, and the rich mercy of God as shown in redemption by the blood of Emmanuel; with regeneration, "repentance, and works meet for repentance," faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, the necessity and nature of holiness; the influences and fruits of the Spirit; the day of judgment, and eternal happiness and misery; delivered in the simplest, plainest language, suited them far better, than those deeper mysteries, which led to more speculation, and which afforded the teacher a fairer opportunity of showing his knowledge, ingenuity and capacity. On these the apostle did not much insist; because he knew the Corinthians could not bear them; (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Mark 4:33,34. John 16:12,13.) and likewise that such instructions would feed carnal passions, instead of faith and love. Indeed, though a considerable time had since elapsed, they were not yet able to receive and make a good use of these sublimer truths, because they were still under the influence of worldly principles. This needed no other proof than their well-known conduct: for while they envied one another the gifts which God had bestowed on them, and with emulation sought their own credit in the exercise of them; (Notes, 14.) while there subsisted eager contentions and lamentable divisions among them; could they deny that they were "carnal," and acted more like men of the world, in their competitions and contests for honours and distinctions, or for the interest of a party, or the credit of a favourite orator or philosopher, than like "spiritual" men? The principles and affections of "the natural man" were more prominent in their conduct, than the humble, meek, loving, and peaceable dispositions, which spring from regeneration.—It is evident that by carnal, and as men, the apostle does not here intend the prevalence of sensual appetites, but that of malignant passions: not the propensities of the animal, but those of the fallen spirit: and this may confirm the interpretation given of this, and similar words, in other places. (Notes, Rom. 8:1—13. Gal. 5:19—26.)—As "spiritual" is opposed to "carnal," it must relate exclusively to the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit: and not at all to miraculous endowments. The Corinthians were enriched with the latter; but some of them seemed altogether destitute of the former, and the generality of them were but "babes in Christ."

The apostle considered the Romans capable of receiving the simpler parts of "the things of the Spirit of God:" which "the natural man cannot receive." (2:14.) V. 4—9. The apostle cautiously forbore for the present to mention the false teachers at Corinth, who had done the mischief. Even if Paul, and his beloved brother Apollos, had been set up for the heads of the contending parties, the contests of the Corinthians would have proved them to be carnal. (Notes, 1:10—16. 4:6,7.) For who were Paul and Apollos? Not "lords over God's heritage," but ministering servants to them for Christ's sake; by whose labours they had been brought to believe the gospel, according to the gift of God, both to the ministers, and to those converted by them. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. 2 Cor. 1:23,24. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.)—'For what reason do you regard either the one or the other? Is it on no consideration but that of talents, which they have in common with many who are strangers to the gospel? Or ought it not to be in a different view, even because they are the ministers of Christ?' Doddridge.—Indeed Paul had been sent to inclose and plant the Lord's vineyard at Corinth; and when he had done this, Apollos had followed him to water it; but God alone had given the increase, and made the plants to grow and become fruitful. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Acts 18:1—11,24—28.) 'The power of growing, in this sacred agriculture, is neither by nature in the plants themselves, nor inserted by the diligence of the cultivator: but it springs entirely from the grace and efficacy of the Holy Spirit. ... Not that their labour is vain; ... for "faith comes by hearing:" but first, God does not use their ministry, because he needs either it or them, or is unable to do without them: again, they could not perform what they do, unless God of his mere mercy had constituted them his labourers. But especially, because all their work is external, God alone claiming to himself exclusively all that is inwardly done in man's salvation: that his Restorer unto life eternal may be one and the same, who was his Creator to this present life.' Beza. Thus neither of the instruments were any thing compared with the great Agent. (P. O. John 11:28—40.) Yet both ministers were as one; both acted as servants in the same work, and with the same intention of glorifying God by seeking the salvation of souls: and they would each receive a gracious reward from their common Master, who was the only competent Judge of their faithfulness and diligence. For they were "fellow-labourers of God:" while the church at Corinth was his husbandry, in which he employed and wrought by them; it

V. 10—15. Thus far the apostle proceeded on the supposition that the labourers were skilful and faithful; but he meant to lead the attention of the Corinthians to some who were not so. He therefore declared, that, "according to the grace bestowed on him," (Notes, 15:3—11, vv. 10,11. Rom. 12:3—5. Eph. 4:7—10.) he had laid the Foundation of "God's building" among them like a wise architect; and he knew that it was capable of supporting the whole weight of the intended superstructure. But since he left Corinth, "another had builded on" his Foundation; nay several had been employed in that work: but "let every one take heed" with what materials, and in what manner he carried on the building. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) The apostle knew that no man could lay any other foundation of a spiritual temple, for the glory of God, or for the sinner's hope of salvation, than what he had laid in his preaching, and which God had laid in his purpose, and by the gospel; namely, the Person, mediatorial office, righteousness, atonement, intercession, and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Is. 28:16. Matt. 16: 18. Rom. 10:1—4. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) If a man laid any other foundation than this, he could not be considered as one of "the fellow-labourers of God." (9) The apostle did not here put the supposition, that this was the case with any of their teachers. Yet, even on this Foundation, very different materials might be builded: some might carry on the work with "gold, silver, and valuable stones;" others with "wood, hay, or stubble." (Marg. Ref. c—e.) Some, who preached the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ, would instruct believers from the word of God, in all the great and holy truths of the gospel in due connexion, proportion, and symmetry; show them their obligations and duties; and teach them to evidence their faith, by spiritual worship and devoted holy obedience. Others might substitute false doctrines, human inventions, abrogated ceremonies, and philosophical speculations; or deduce licentious inferences from the doctrines of grace. (Notes, 5:1—5. Gal. 4:8 —11. Col. 2:8,9.) Thus the building might be deformed and weakened, by such additions and base materials, as would never stand the trial which God had appointed.—For the time was coming, when the nature and value of "every man's work" would be made manifest: the day of judgment would openly declare it. The materials of this spiritual building, and every man's work in it, must be "tried as by fire," during the discoveries of that solemn season. This will prove them "of what sort they are:" the "gold, silver, and precious stones" will stand the fire, and even be purified by it; and he who has built with these approved materials will receive an abundant reward: but "the wood, hay, and stubble" will be burned; and he, who has spent his time and labour in building with such worthless materials, will suffer great loss, even in respect of the degree of his future glory; yet, provided he is indeed fixed on the good Foundation, he shall finally be saved. (Marg. Ref. f—i.) He will however be as a man is preserved from the flames of his house, when he escapes naked through them, and thus narrowly saves his life with the loss of all his property. So extremely dangerous is it to teach false doctrines, even in connexion with fundamental truths! (Marg. Ref. k—m.) The extreme absurdity of the papists, in producing this passage, in support of their doctrine of purgatory, is very obvious but it is to be feared, that the zealous abettors of that doctrine, and many others of a similar nature, will be found to build wholly without a foundation. V. 16, 17. The metaphor of a building led the apostle to inquire, whether the Christians at Corinth did not know, that they were "the temple of God," and that the Holy Spirit dwelt in them. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, 6:18—20. Is. 57· 15,16. John 14:21—24. Rom. 8:10,11. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.)—The in-dwelling of the Holy Spirit constitutes "the temple of God;" this is express testimony to his Deity. Now, if any man defiled or profaned the temple of God, he would be exposed to his indignation, and might expect the most terrible destruction; because of the holiness of the temple, as consecrated to God. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) It would therefore be extremely dangerous for any one, by false doctrines or a licentious example, to defile the church, or any of its members: and if the teachers were chargeable with a crime of so aggravated a nature, they would have reason to fear the severest judgments of God; and would be presumptuous in expecting to be "saved even as by fire." (Note, 10—15, v. 15.)—'They are said by the apostle to defile the temple of God, who corrupted the purity of the gospel by carnal eloquence; and who rent the church by factions.' Beza.—'The like words used, (6:16—19.) by way of dehortation from fornication, and (2 Cor. 6:16.) from communion with heathen, in their idolatrous rites and heathen practices; and by way of inducement to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit;" (2 Cor. 7:1.) more naturally incline us to refer these verses to the corrupting of the temple of God, by uncleanness and fornication, or by idolatrous practices; both which the Corinthians did.' Whitby. It does not, however, appear, that there is any necessity of confining the interpretation to this or the other kind of defilement: and in proportion as the declaration is made general, it becomes more and more important. The verb, rendered "destroy," is the same with that before translated "defile." The Jews polluted the temple of God by their crimes, and were given up into the hands of their enemies as polluted, to be destroyed by them: the temple was given up to be profaned and destroyed for their crimes, and part of the awful doom of the wicked is thus expressed, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." V. 18—23. 'The Corinthians were induced to eat things offered to idols, in the idol-temples, by men pretending to great knowledge.... (8:1,2.) They also introduced among them the doctrine of the lawfulness of fornication. (5:1.)... immediately concerned in the preceding warning, were in danger of despising it, especially coming from one whom they disregarded, as far beneath them in knowledge and wisdom: but let them not "deceive themselves" in this matter. (Marg. Ref. s.) If any one of them appeared "to be wise in this world;" instead of trusting to such a distinction, "let him become a fool," in his own opinion, and in that of worldly men; and indeed this would be absolutely necessary, in order to his being made wise unto everlasting life. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Note, Matt. 18:1—4.) For God accounted "the wisdom of this world" to be folly: he ensnared the worldly-wise in their own politics and devices, and he knew their reasonings and imaginations to be vain and worthless. (Marg. Ref. x—b. Notes, 1:17—25. Job 5:12—16. Ps. 94:10,11.)—Let therefore none "glory in men;" as if some eloquent, learned, or sagacious leader were a great honour to them, and they might value themselves on their relation to him. (Notes, 2 Cor. 10:7—18. Gal. 4:17—20. 6:11—14.) Whereas on the contrary "all things were theirs," if indeed they were believers. The abilities, gifts, and services of apostles and ministers, were intended for their benefit; the world, and every thing in it, belonged to them, as far as it could do them good; its possessions would be given them, if really profitable; its enmity would discipline them for heaven; and all providential appointments would promote their sanctification. "Life" would be ensured to them, till their work was done, and they were ripe for their reward; "death," at the appointed hour, would come, as their friend, to deliver them from sin and sorrow, and convey them to their Father's mansions; present comforts and trials would concur in promoting their advantage; and the "future" judgment and its eternal consequences, would be altogether in their favour. Thus "all things were theirs," even as much as if the whole property of the creation had been vested in them. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Rom. 4:13. 8:28—39. 2 Cor. 4:5,6,13—18. 6:3—10. Phil. 1:21—26.) This was and would certainly be the case, if indeed they belonged to Christ, "the Heir of all things;" and were one with him, his chosen and redeemed people, the members of his body, his beloved, the trophies of his victories, and the jewels of his crown; and as "Christ is God's," his beloved Son, is appointed Surety, "the Brightness of his glory," and the grand Medium of displaying all his perfections, in the sight of all worlds, and to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) These were truly honourable distinctions: and they ought to recollect, that by "glorying in men," they acted inconsistently with their relation and obligations to Christ, to whom alone they ought unreservedly to devote themselves.—He taketh, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. Ministers should suit their instruction to the state and wants of their hearers, and teach them such things, as more immediately tend to their edification; rather than insist continually on those subjects, which are agreeable to their own inclinations, or those of any party.—"Babes" in Christ must be "fed with milk, and not with strong meat:" many doctrines, which they may hereafter feed upon and digest into strengthening nutriment, would at present be useless, or pernicious; because they are not able to perceive the tendency of them, or their harmony with other truths.—Men may have much doctrinal knowledge, and yet be mere novices in the life of faith and experience: nay, their promptitude to speculations, and their acuteness in them, may prove them to be in a great degree "carnal," and very imperfectly grounded even in the first principles of experimental and practical religion. Thus many professed Christians, yea preachers, show themselves to be "yet carnal," by their vainglorious emulations, their eagerness for controversy, their selfish fiery zeal, their disposition to prefer and exalt themselves, and to despise and revile others; and their apparent delight in disturbing the peace of the church. This is the tendency of sin, not of grace; the temper of the "carnal," the "natural man," and not of the "spiritual:" and we want a large measure of that "love which hopeth all things" to suppose, that wranglers of this kind have any spirituality, or are even "babes in Christ." It is, however, an universal rule, that these evils proportionably prove, that the carnal mind is prominent and prevalent: and while so many are saying, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos;" we may fairly demand of them, whether they be not altogether carnal. For, what are the most able ministers, but servants of Christ and of his people? They do not come in their own name, or about their own business; they do not seek their own glory, or interest, or ease, or indulgence: sin and folly are all that they have of their own, and their wisdom and grace are wholly from the Lord. (Note, John 1:16.) By his help, they may "plant and water;" but he alone can "give the increase:" so that they are "nothing," and he alone must be considered as the Object of confidence and attachment, as well as of our adoring love and gratitude.—Faithful ministers indeed are afraid of receiving undue honour. Though their rank and abilities may differ, they are all "one;" they are engaged in the same work, and aim at the same object: they are "fellow-labourers of God," in his spiritual husbandry and building; and he will graciously reward the services, which, by his grace, they have performed. Indeed, all those, who, in their several places, labour by scriptural means to promote the cause of true religion, are "workers together with God:" (Notes, 1 Sam. 14:45,46. Acts 14:24—28. Rom. 15:18—21.) but all ungodly men, especially persecutors, false teachers seducers, tempters, and such as employ their ingenuity in disseminating infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness, are "fellow-workers" with the devil, in rendering others wicked and miserable; and their recompense will be proportioned to their zeal, diligence, and success.

V. 10—15. It is a great comfort to the minister of Christ, when, on reflection, he is humbly conscious of having, like "a wise architect," laid a right Foundation: but every man should also take heed what "he buildeth upon it." For, while many attempt in vain to substitute some other foundation, in the stead of Christ, and so perish with their deluded followers; there are likewise numbers, who lay the right Foundation, and yet build worthless materials upon it, to their own great loss and danger, and to the great peril and detriment of their hearers. In expectation therefore of that solemn day, when "every man's work shall be manifested," and "tried as by fire," we should now be careful to build with approved and precious materials: we should most carefully reject all superstitious inventions, unscriptural doctrines, enthusiastical delusions, and philosophical speculations; nay indeed a variety of trifling inquiries and disputations, about which many, who seem to lay the right Foundation, waste their time, and lose their labour, while they injure the building and endanger their own souls. We should bestow pains to procure gold, silver, and precious stones for this work from the inexhaustible stores of the sacred oracles; that, with sound doctrine, and scriptural instructions, we may build up the souls of believers in knowledge, hope, love, and obedience; that, by our labours, example, and prayers, they may grow up a "holy temple to the Lord." Thus our work will abide the fiery trial, and we shall receive "a full reward," and have "an abundant entrance ministered unto us into the everlasting kingdom of Christ."—It is peculiarly incumbent upon ministers, in all their studies, pursuits, sermons, publications, and conversation, to recollect that their "work must be tried by fire;" to anticipate the sentiments, which the day of judgment will inevitably obtrude upon them, concerning their present occupations; and to reflect on the irreparable loss of spending their time of service to no purpose or perniciously; to consider the tendency of their undertakings; to compare them with the word of God; and to "judge themselves that they may not be judged of the Lord." For if shame and sorrow could enter heaven; surely the minister, whose work shall be burned, yet "he himself saved as through fire," would be overwhelmed with these distressing feelings.

V. 16—23. When faithful admonitions have no effect on the minds of men, their state is very awful. It is proper, however, to warn them, with all solemnity, concerning the guilt and danger of "defiling the temple of God," by their false doctrines and bad examples. Many of them will indeed despise the warning, and "deceive themselves." (Note, 6:9—11. Gal. 6:6—10. Eph. 5:5—7.)—The reputation of being "wise in this world," is no favourable evidence of a man's character; as "the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God," who "takes the wise in their own craftiness," and exposes the vanity of their counsels and speculations. It cannot therefore be too earnestly inculcated on all, to "cease from their own wisdom," and to be willing to think themselves "fools," and to be thought so by others; that they may become wise by the teaching of the word and Spirit of God. (Note, 4:9—13.)—But we all should remember, that true Christians are "the temple of God," who dwelleth in them by his sanctifying Spirit: and those who know not this can hardly be thought even "babes in Christ." If we are conscious of this spiritual consecration to God, to be his living temples; let us be careful to have our sacred character adorned by a holy conversation, and to avoid whatever may defile either ourselves or our fellow-Christians. And surely he is deceived, who deems himself the temple of the Holy Spirit; and yet is unconcerned, or but little concerned, about personal holiness, or about the purity and peace of th

CHAPTER IV.

The apostles, and preachers of the gospel, should be accounted of, as ministering servants to Christ, and "stewards of the mysteries of God;" and they are required as such to be faithful, 1, 2. They must be left to the judgment of the Lord at his coming, 3—5. The apostle exhorts the Corinthians, not to be puffed up for one against the other: as all have their different endowments from God, 6, 7. He contrasts their vainglory and supposed proficiency; with his own despised and afflicted state, and lowly conduct, 8—13. He warns them, as their only "father in Christ," and exhorts them to imitate him, 14—16. For this purpose he had sent Timothy unto them, 17; and intended to come himself: and to make trial of the power of those who oppose him, 18—21.

church!—If indeed we are the children of God, we have something nobler to glory in, than in men, and our relation and attachment to them; for "all things are ours:" apostles, prophets, ministers, ordinances, providential dispensations, earth, heaven, life, death, things temporal, and things eternal are ours; and shall be ours for ever, notwithstanding all our most powerful enemies, sharp conflicts, and our lamented weakness and sin that still dwelleth in us: for indeed we are one with Christ, and his purchased and redeemed people; and he is One with the Father. (Note, Col. 3:1—4, vv. 3,4.) As the glory of God is displayed in Christ his Son, our salvation is secured in Christ our Head, who will cause us to sit down as conquerors, through him "upon his throne, even as he hath overcome, and hath sat down with his Father upon his throne." (Note, Rev. 3:20—22.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. Lest the Corinthians should conclude, from what the apostle had said, that little respect or affection was due to ministers; he here showed them in what estimation they ought to hold them, and by what measure they ought to regulate their regard to them. Whether they were apostles, evangelists, or ordinary pastors and teachers, they ought to consider them, not indeed as lords, but as the "ministering servants of Christ" for their benefit, in the highest and most important office: even as the "stewards of the mysteries of God;" as his immediate representatives, appointed by his authority, they should preside in his family, take care of his interest and honour, instruct and direct the services of their brethren, and give every one his portion in due season. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. 25:14—30. Luke 16:1—8. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) Thus they were intrusted with the mysterious and sublime truths of the gospel, that they might preach them to the people; and apply them with suitable admonitions, exhortations, encouragements and warnings, according to what every one's case required, in order to the conversion of sinners, and the establishment and edification of believers. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Matt. 13:10,11. Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—7. Col. 2:1—4. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Some, by "the mysteries of God," understand also the administration of the sacraments, which were commonly called "mysteries" by the ancient fathers: but though this is a part of the minister's work; yet the external ordinances are not called "mysteries" in Scripture; and this name, afterwards given them, helped to lead men to form a wrong judgment concerning them, which has in every age produced, and still does produce most mischievous effects; by leading men to confound the sign of godliness with the thing signified, and with the power of godliness. 'That which this day is generally called a sacrifice, is the sign of the true Sacrifice. If the sacraments had not a certain similitude of those things of which they are sacraments, they would be no sacraments at all: now it is for the similitude or resemblance, that they often bear the name of the things themselves.' Augustine. Thus baptism was called regeneration, and the Lord's supper, a sacrifice: till the things signified were lost sight of, and the sign alone regarded and idolized. And alas! it is so still, not only among Papists, but to a very great degree, in the Protestant, Lutheran, and reformed churches, with their rulers and teachers.—Now, it was well known, that exact fidelity was the most essential qualification required "in a steward." A man of strict probity, attached to his master's interest, and impartial in his conduct towards his fellow-servants, might be a valuable steward, though his accomplishments were but moderate and his address uncourtly; but nothing could compensate for the want of "faithfulness." Thus a minister who, uprightly and simply, sought the glory of God and the good of souls; and who impartially dispensed the truths of God, without respect of persons, or regard to his own interest, honour, ease, or indulgence, would be accepted by the Lord, and ought to be valued by believers; though not so eminent in natural endowments, eloquence, learning, or polite accomplishments; or even in spiritual gifts and attainments, as others were, who sought themselves in their admired ministrations.

V. 3—5. The apostle counted it a "very small matter," compared with the acceptance of his gracious Lord, what judgment the Corinthians, or any man, formed of him; whether they supposed him to be faithful or not; or whether they were offended with him for his faithfulness, and despised him because he had not "come with excellency of speech or of wisdom." Indeed he did not rely on his own judgment concerning himself, because he was aware of the deceitfulness of the human heart: for though he was not indeed conscious of any unfaithfulness or self-seeking in his ministry; yet this was not sufficient to justify him before God, who often saw that evil in the heart, which pride and self-flattery hid from the man himself. He therefore sought to the Lord to judge him, and so waited for that day when he must appear before his tribunal. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, 3:10—15. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.) Knowing, however, that many were disposed to think unfavourably of him, through the artifices of their seducers; he exhorted them not to judge matters of this importance before the time: but to leave them till the Lord should come to judgment, when characters and actions would appear in another light than they did at present. (Note, Rom. 14:10—12.) For the Judge will then both discover the secret sins of men's lives, which they had veiled in darkness from the view of their neighbours; and disclose the motives and intentions, which lay concealed in the impenetrable recesses of the heart; and which would, in numberless instances, appear to be designing, ambitious, and selfish, when the man's words and works were most specious and plausible. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, Ec. 12:11—14, v. 14. Rom. 2:12—16. Heb. 4:12, 13. Rev. 20:11—15.) On the other hand, those holy desires, and pure motives, and secret acts of piety and charity, which men overlooked or slandered, will be shown in the full light of day. (Notes, Ps. 37:5—8. Matt. 6:1—4.) Then the faithful steward will be proportionably honoured with the commendation of God himself, which would abundantly counterbalance the contempt and reproach of men: (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Matt. 25:19—23. 1 Pet. 1:6,7.) but it will be a day of detection and confusion to all hypocritical, ambitious, and self-seeking teachers, however admired and extolled.—'Hence note, that Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of the secrets of the hearts of all men, subject to his judgment: and so must be that God, who alone knows the hearts of all men. ... 1 Kings 8:39. 1 Chr. 28:9. Jer. 17:10.' Whitby. (Note, Rev. 2:20—23.) 'This saying of Paul,' ("Judge nothing before the time,") 'must be restrained to a certain hypothesis: for both the spirits are to be tried, and we ought to "judge ourselves whether we be in the faith." The apostle does not even condemn the private judgments of charity; and much less either civil or ecclesiastical polity. For he is not, properly, discoursing about the examination of men's doctrine or manners; but rather concerning the estimate that is to be made of each person by men, which, says he, the Lord will at last judge. Finally, when he says, that he "knew nothing by himself;" it must be referred to the subject of which he was treating, namely, the ministerial office; which, he testifies, he had fulfilled among the Corinthians, with so good a conscience, that he could not charge himself with any fraud or negligence. ... This wonderfully suited both those teachers, who seemed to themselves so excellent in comparison of Paul; and those hearers, who (like the persons who sat in the theatre, in order to confer the crown on the best performer,) so boldly extolled or depressed whom they would. But indeed, says Paul, I cannot pronounce concerning myself, in that manner which ye do, concerning me and others.' Beza. (Note, 2. Cor. 1:12—14.) 'This only forbids our censures of things uncertain, of which no righteous judgment can be passed, because we cannot be certain concerning the truth of that judgment; and of things which it belongs not to us to judge of. This appears both from the words and the occasion of them. From the words; for they respect "the hidden things of darkness," and "the counsels of the heart." ... From the occasion of them; they passing their censures on St. Paul, and questioning his fidelity in his office, of whom they had no authority so to judge, nor any occasion so to judge.' Whitby.

V. 6, 7. In speaking of those, who had been considered as heads of different parties at Corinth, the apostle had chiefly mentioned himself and Apollos; and thus to avoid giving offence, he had, as by a figure, transferred the case from the persons principally concerned, to those whom he could not be thought disposed to undervalue; that in them, the teachers might learn not to be "wise in their own conceits;" and the people not to think too highly of men, calling them masters, or glorying in being their disciples; and thus esteeming them as something more than servants or stewards, or above what he had written according to the word of God, and on other accounts than because of their faithfulness. (Marg. Ref. n —q. Notes, Matt. 23:8—12. Rom. 12:3—8.) Indeed, both they and the teachers, (whom they placed in competition with each other, and about whom they were puffed up,) ought to inquire "who had made them to differ," from their idolatrous neighbours, or their fellow-Christians. Was this difference the effect of their superior merit, docility, or goodness? "What had they, which they had not received" as free-gifts, or as talents committed to their stewardship? Why then did they "glory" and boast: as if they had been the independent authors of those endowments, by which they were distinguished from others; and as if they were authorized to employ them to their own glory or advantage, without being accountable to God for them? Surely, such self-exaltation must be most absurd, abominable, and sacrilegious. (Marg. Ref. r—u.)— It is evident, that the apostle is here more immediately speaking of natural abilities and spiritual gifts; and not of regenerating and efficacious grace. Yet if we all are, by nature, entirely depraved; if we must be born again, and new created; if it "is God that worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure," and if "by grace we are saved through faith, and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God;" the apostle's reasoning is at least as conclusive, against all kinds and degrees of self-preference on account of our religious attainments, and all glorying in ourselves and other men, as against that which he was directly opposing. (Notes, 7:25—28. 15:3—11.)

V. 8. After the apostle had left Corinth, and the church had found more eloquent or flattering teachers, they were satisfied and pleased: they thought themselves rich and happy, and seemed to "reign as kings" without him and his fellow-labourers; who had treated them as children, and kept them under far more than was agreeable to them. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Note, 3:1—3.) Many of them, it is probable, were in prosperous circumstances, and exempted from persecution; they had abundance of spiritual gifts; they grew vain of their distinctions; and they deemed themselves pre-eminent above other churches: and thus they were led to use this improper language one among another; but the apostle intimated that they were under a lamentable delusion (Note, Rev. 3:17.) He indeed most cordially desired, that they should be as happy, prosperous, honourable, and eminent, as they thought themselves: for then he knew that he should have comfort in them, and credit among them. If they had really "reigned as kings," he should have "reigned with them;" instead of being despised by them, in addition to all his other trials and persecutions. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Rev. 1:4—6. 5:8—10.)

V. 9—13. It appeared to St. Paul, that God had chosen him and the other apostles, to be set apart, like those condemned persons in the gladiatorial shows, who were brought forth last without any defensive armour, to fight with each other, or to be exposed to wild beasts, till they were slain in the sight of the spectators; and who, if they escaped at one time, were only reserved to another day of slaughter: being "appointed unto death," and having no hope of more than a short respite. Thus, the apostles were distinguished by a larger share of contempt, hardship, and suffering, than any of their brethren; and were appointed to martyrdom at the end of their course, and as the only termination of their trials that, conflicting with exceedingly urgent difficulties and distresses, in patient faith and persevering hope, and supported by omnipotent grace, they might be "a spectacle" to the whole intelligent creation, both men and angels; while all holy beings beheld them with solicitous affection and astonishment; and unholy beings with malice, rage, and disappointment. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) In this conflict Paul and his brethren were counted "fools for Christ's sake;" (Notes, Acts 17:18. 26:24—29.) not only by unconverted Jews and Gentiles, but by the Christians at Corinth also; who accounted themselves to be "wise in Christ," through the admired instructions of their speculating teachers, the liberty to which they supposed themselves entitled, and the politic methods which they used for escaping contempt and persecution. They thought the apostle, and such as he, weak, timid, and scrupulous Christians, men of feeble minds, narrow capacities, and inferior attainments: but they supposed themselves "strong" in faith, of great discernment, and superior to those fears and disquietudes, which troubled others. Nay, it is probable that they deemed themselves honourable, on account of their affluence, knowledge, and wisdom; and despised the apostle and his friends, as mean and obscure persons. (Marg. Ref. f—l. Notes, 2 Cor. 10:7 —11. 11:1—6,16—20.) Thus, while they lived in plenty, he and his companions in travel, and the other apostles in great measure, continued even "to that day," exposed to hunger and thirst: they often wanted even suitable raiment to appear in before their auditories: they were buffeted with contempt and cruelty; they wandered about without any settled habitation; and they earned their mean and scanty subsistence by the labour of their own hands. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Notes, 9:6. Acts 20:32—35. 2 Cor. 11:21—27. 12:7—15. Phil. 4:10— 13. 1 Thes. 3:6—10. 2 Tim. 4:9—13.) Yet, when they were reviled, they blessed and prayed for those who reproached them: they endured persecution patiently; they returned humble entreaties for slander and defamation. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) But, while thus rendering good for evil, they were treated as the "filth of the world," and the refuse and scum of the earth, even to that very time: they were considered as below contempt, or as worthy of execration, as pestilences and nuisances, who ought to be extirpated and purged out of society; as the common sewer carries away the filth and offscouring of the city, to prevent infection and disease. (Notes, Lam. 3:45. Acts 22:22—30. 24:1—9.) Some understand the words of certain human victims, peculiarly mean and vile, whom the idolaters used to offer to the infernal gods, with vehement expressions of abhorrence and execration.

V. 14—17. The apostle assured the Corinthians, that he did not thus state his distresses as contrasted with their prosperity and fulness, in order to put them to shame for neglecting him, and adding to his troubles: but he affectionately warned them, as his beloved children, that their ambition, carnal security, attachment to false teachers, and lamentable divisions, would expose them to great dangers and evils. For, "though they should have ten thousand instructers" to teach them religion, as schoolmasters are hired to educate other men's children; yet they would not find them endued with the disinterested, faithful, and prudent affection of a father; or entitled to the authority and honour due to a parent. This he regarded as his own character, spirit, and claim: for he had been the instrument of Christ Jesus, in their conversion to the faith, by successfully preaching the gospel to them. As therefore they were his children, he was tenderly solicitous for their welfare: and he must speak with authority as a parent, and had a right to their respectful obedience. (Marg. Ref. u—a. Notes, 2 Cor. 12:14,15. 1 Thes. 2:1—12.) He, however, would rather beseech them in love, to be "followers of him," in preference to their new teachers; to adhere to the doctrines, regard the admonitions, obey the commands, and imitate the example, which he had given them. (Marg. Ref. b. Note, 2 Cor. 6:11 —13.)—For this purpose, not being at that time able to come himself, he had sent Timothy to them, who was his beloved son, converted by his ministry, resembling him in spirit and conduct, and faithful in the Lord, as "a steward of his mysteries." And Timothy, when he came, would recall to their remembrance the apostle's doctrines, and the regulations that he made in every church which he planted; that whatever had been put into disorder since he left Corinth, might be rectified before he came again. V. 18—21. Some of the teachers and their adherents, at Corinth, were so puffed up with their imaginary importance and superiority, that they were confident the apostle would not venture to come among them, or attempt to intermeddle in their affairs. (Notes, 5:1—5. 16:5—9. 2 Cor. 1:15—24.) But he assured them that he fully intended to come, if the Lord would enable him: and then he would make trial, not of their oratory and admired eloquence, or "wisdom of words;" but of their power to support themselves, in opposition to his apostolical authority, and the miracles which he should perform in confirmation of it. For "the kingdom of God," was not set up in the world, or in men's hearts, by well chosen words or eloquent harangues; but by "the power of God," exerted in working miracles to prove the divine original of the gospel, and especially in the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit to convert the souls of men. (Marg. Ref. h—l. Notes, 2 Cor. 10:1—11,17,18. 12:14,15. 13:1—10.) The Corinthians could not but know, that the apostle's testimony had been confirmed among them by miracles. Would they then choose that he should come to them, with the rod of correction, denouncing spiritual censures, and inflicting miraculous judgments on the refractory, as he had done on Elymas; and as Peter had done on Ananias and Sapphira? (Notes, 5:1—5. Acts 5:1—11. 13:6—12. 2 Cor. 13:1—4.) Or would they, that he should come to them in the spirit of tender love and meekness, to encourage, commend, and comfort them? This would depend on their conduct, in respect of those evils which he was about to specify; for if they were not remedied, he should be compelled to exercise a salutary severity on the offenders. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The ministers of Christ ought by all means to be as deeply sensible of the importance of their trust, as of the dignity of their office; that, as active and self-denying labourers, as well as "stewards of the mysteries of God," they may be "faithful" to him and to his church; that they may disregard their own interest, indulgence, and reputation; and willingly endure reproach and suffering, for the honour of their Lord and the salvation of souls. Thus they should apply themselves with diligence, impartiality, boldness, and simplicity, to dispense "the mysteries of God," and "rightly to divide the word of truth" among the people, according to their characers and conduct; (Note, 2 Tim. 2:14—18.) remembering, that faithfulness is indispensably requisite in a steward; and that every other qualification must be contemptible, in the eye of all competent judges, if this be wanting.—Christians also should learn to value ministers, not so much in proportion to the brilliancy of their gifts, or their rank and station in the church, as their integrity and disinterested faithfulness: and those persons certainly offend the Lord, who slight such as are true to their trust; as they also do, who tempt them to be unfaithful, by flatteries, bribes, frowns, censures, or contempt. Indeed, it ought to be "the smallest matter" with us, to be judged of men, or blamed for that which God approves, even by those whom we most love: yet it requires a superior strength of faith and grace to be so totally indifferent to the opinion of others, as not to be influenced by it: and many are thus tempted to waver, or warp from the constancy of their testimony. (Notes, Acts 20:18 —28. P. O. 13—31.) But men must be incompetent judges: nay though we know more of ourselves, than any others can do of us, yet our own judgment is not to be depended on in respect of our faithfulness, any more than our own works in respect of our justification. We should therefore rely in this, as in all other things, on the Lord: beseeching him to preserve us from deceiving ourselves, and to plead our cause against unjust censures and suspicions: and, in respect of others, we should, in all doubtful matters, especially in respect of motives, refrain from passing judgment; waiting "till the Lord come." (Note, Matt. 7:1—5.) Then every secret will be disclosed, every heart will be laid open, and all counsels manifested: every hypocrite will be unmasked, every slandered believer justified, and every faithful servant and steward applauded and rewarded. Waiting for that solemn season, and preparing to render our account; we should beware of thinking of ourselves or of others, "above what is written" in the word of God, and of being "puffed up for one against another:" lest we should despise those whom God will then honour, applaud those whose "hidden things of darkness" he will then disclose, or trust and glory in man instead of the Lord himself.—If we duly consider, what we are by nature and practice, who has made us in every respect to differ from others; and from whom we have received all our talents: we shall see no ground of "glorying in ourselves" on any account, but rather of much shame and humiliation before God; even if, in some respects, we are distinguished from our brethren, and if we do not overrate our endowments, which we very generally do. For our responsibility increases with our talents; and it is seldom, that our faithfulness and diligence increase proportionably.

V. 8—13. Fallen man is most apt to count himself full, rich and honourable, when he is most blind, poor and naked; and many professors of the gospel, like glow-worms, in the dark shine most, as to their own opinion of themselves, when their real character is most obscure and doubtful. The absence of faithful ministers concurs with the smooth and enticing words of false teachers, to buoy them up in vain

CHAPTER V.

The apostle sharply reproves a scandalous incest, protected from censure, in the church at Corinth, 1, 2. By the authority of Christ he orders the excommunication of the incestuous person, 3—5. He shows that the leaven of sin must be purged out, in order to keep the true "passover," by faith in Christ, 6—8. Scandalous professors of Christianity must be shunned, more decidedly than those without, 9—13.

confidence, and to lead them to admire the wisdom of avoiding the cross, of attempting to "serve God and mammon," and of counting self-indulgence the summit of evangelical liberty. But such ministers, as most desire, and would most rejoice, in their real prosperity, will be the last to congratulate them on their admission into this 'fool's paradise:' and they may know, to what a precarious and carnal kingdom they are advanced, by their shyness towards those pastors who "will also reign with them," if ever they are admitted into the kingdom of heaven.—They, whom God has most honoured, have always been proportionably despised, hated, and abused by men; and their sufferings, even unto death have made them an interesting spectacle to all the intelligent creation.—The consideration that so many eyes are upon us, when struggling with difficulties, or conflicting with temptation, should animate us to unconquerable constancy and patience; that holy angels and saints may rejoice, and that evil spirits and wicked men may be disappointed and confounded.—The wisest of men, the strongest believers, and the most honoured of God's ambassadors, have been thought "fools for Christ's sake;" and treated as weak and contemptible, through bodily infirmities, poverty, and the mean appearance and accommodation connected with it, from want of worldly accomplishments, and because of an unpliant faithfulness to the souls of men. Yea, this has been the estimate made of them among Christians, and even their own converts, who have counted themselves "wise in Christ, strong, and honourable," in exact proportion as they were inferior to those, whom they thus undervalued!—It is very instructive to reflect on the apostles, as invested with the highest rank and authority in the church, endued with miraculous powers, and conferring them on others evidently and extensively, and most eminent in holiness and usefulness: yet even to the end of their lives so entirely poor and destitute, as often to want the very necessaries of life; earning their bread by manual labour, and treated every where as mean, obscure, or execrable criminals, "the filth of the world, and the offscouring of all things!" It would be useful to those, who imagine, that the credit of the ministry depends, in a great measure, on their making a creditable, or even a genteel, appearance, and who emulate the affluent in the expenses of their families, to meditate carefully on the subject before us; that they might be led to discern "a more excellent way" of maintaining the dignity of character, becoming the ministers of Him "who had not where to lay his head." If indeed superior rank in the church were now attended with apostolical distinctions alone, it would not so eagerly be pursued.—We ought not, however, to be cast down, if, in some small degree, we are conformed to the apostles, as to these things; and if we too should be counted "fools for Christ's sake," weak and despicable, even by professors of the gospel. Though unable to live and appear like our wealthy hearers, (and surely we should not desire to do it,) we do not generally want wholesome food, decent raiment, or comfortable habitations: and, if in some very rare instances, a faithful minister be so entirely destitute, it is commonly the reproach of the people, rather than any disparagement to him.—We should however persist in blessing, entreating, and being kind to our calumniators and persecutors: and if we should be unable "to overcome evil with good," but still be treated with contempt and abhorrence, we may recollect that far better men than we are have been thus vilified.

V. 14—21. It is peculiarly distressing, when a faithful minister sees his spiritual children turn away from him, with disdain and aversion: but, let such as experience this heavy yet common affliction, remember that St. Paul continually experienced the same: let him not then be bowed down with discouragement.—No man indeed should be followed further than he "follows Christ:" yet believers should remember that a peculiar regard is due to those, whom God hath honoured as the instruments of their regeneration; that it is very criminal to despise or grieve those hearty friends, who feel a real parental affection for them; and that those instructers are commonly influenced by selfish or party motives, who want to draw them off, on frivolous pretences, from the affectionate care and faithful ministry, of "their fathers in Christ, who have begotten them by the gospel." We ought, however, to persevere in attempting to do good to those, who are thus turned from us, or against us: and it may be useful to put them in remembrance of those things, which they have formerly learned, but seem to have forgotten. We should imitate the tenderness of wise and good parents, who are not easily induced to forego all care, even of their disobedient children; but who know how to employ rebukes and corrections, as well as the language of "love and the spirit of meekness."—The kingdom of God is not set up, or supported, by florid metaphors or well-turned periods, but by a divine power; and they are the most eminent ministers, not who speak most gracefully, but by whom God works most powerfully.—Spiritual censures, and scriptural warnings, are greatly to be feared, though not followed at present by sensible temporal judgments: and they who are so self-confident as to despise them, are most likely to experience their dreadful effects.

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—5. After the preceding introductory statements and intimations, the apostle next proceeded to animadvert directly on the most flagrant abuse which was connived at by the Corinthians. Incest with near relations was a crime, which the lawgivers, moralists, and even poets in general, among the Gentiles, never named without the most indignant detestation: yet it was well known and "commonly reported," that a member of the church at Corinth, lived with his mother-in-law as his wife, probably while his father was still living! (Marg. Ref. a—d. Note, 2 Cor. 7:12.) But though so scandalous a wickedness had been committed, and escaped censure among them; they were "puffed up" with a vain conceit of gifts and superior attainments, and were not ashamed of it, or concerned about it. Probably, the guilty person was of considerable rank among them, and a zealous adherent of the popular teachers: so that a party-spirit, and a most erroneous notion of Christian liberty, secured him from the censure of the church. But if the Corinthians in general had been in a truly Christian frame of mind, they would have "mourned over" such an enormity; and humbled themselves before God, with earnest prayers, entreating him to remove all obstacles, that he who had done this nefarious deed might be separated from their company. (Marg. Ref. e—g.) For, though the apostle was absent, and could not therefore exert himself as he would otherwise have done; and though he was aware that his peremptory interference would give great offence to many yet, "being present in spirit," having the whole affair clearly before his mind, (perhaps by a supernatural revelation by the Holy Spirit,) and being full of zeal for the honour of Christ and the welfare of the church: he had already determined in the case, and had passed sentence on the criminal as if upon the spot. He therefore charged them in the name, by the authority, and for the honour of Christ, that, when they met together as a church, they would consider the apostle as present in spirit among them, to ratify their sentence with his delegated authority, and to enforce it by the power of Christ; and thus to expel the incestuous person from their communion: that he might no longer be considered as a Christian, but as a heathen, a subject of Satan's kingdom. (Marg. Ref. h—l. Note, Matt. 18:15—18.) Yet this was not to be done in hatred, or for his ruin; but in hopes that it would be the means of bringing him to repentance, and the mortification of his fleshly lusts, that so, "his soul might be saved in the day of Christ," and with fervent prayers, that this might prove the happy event. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, 2 Thes. 3:14,15.) Probably, the apostle expected, that this solemn sentence of excommunication would be attended by some miraculous infliction of pain and disease, to the wasting, or even the death of his body: (Notes, 11:29—34. 2 Cor. 2:5—11. 1 Tim. 1:18—20.) yet by "delivering him over to Satan," he seems to intend his expulsion from the visible kingdom of Christ into that of the devil; and not that Satan would inflict the correction which might follow. No doubt, evil spirits are able and willing to disorder the body, or distract the mind, or destroy life, if God permit: yet it is far more reasonable to think, that God by miracle directly inflicted the disease, than that he merely permitted Satan to do it. It should however be noted, that when supernatural visitations do not accompany ecclesiastical censures; no temporal pains and penalties, of whatever sort, ought to be annexed to them. Unwarranted severities in this respect have made way for the disuse, or relaxation, of salutary discipline, throughout a great part of the Christian church; the extensively injurious effects of which can never be enough lamented, or indeed fully conceived by those who have not deeply considered the subject.—'A mother-in-law marries her son-in-law, with no favourable auspices, by no authority' destruction of the flesh, [m]that the spirit may be saved in [n]the day of the Lord Jesus.

6 Your [o]glorying is not good. Know ye not that [p]a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?

7 [q]Purge out therefore the old leaven, that [r]ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even [s]Christ our Passover is [t]sacrificed for us:

8 Therefore [u]let us keep the [v]feast, [w]not with old leaven, [x]neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; [y]but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. [Practical Observations.]

9 I wrote unto you in an epistle [z]not to company with fornicators:

10 Yet [a]not altogether with the fornicators [b]of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; [c]for then must ye needs go out of the world.

11 But now I have written unto you, not to keep company, if any man that is [d]called a brother be [e]a fornicator, [f]or covetous, [g]or an idolater, [h]or a railer, [i]or a drunkard, [k]or an extortioner; [l]with such a one no not to eat.

12 For [m]what have I to do to judge [n]them also that are without? [o]do not ye judge them that are within?

13 But them that are without [p]God judgeth. [q]Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person.

V. 6—8. It was evident, that the Corinthians had no reason to glory in their eminence and prosperity; for their connivance at the gross wickedness before mentioned was alone sufficient to prove, that pure religion had greatly declined among them. (Notes, 1—5. 4:6—8.) What! did they not know, that "a little leaven" would soon ferment "the whole lump" of dough? And that corrupt principles and examples, if conived at, would diffuse their baleful efficacy through the whole church? (Note, Matt. 13:33.) The judgment and principles of men would thus be corrupted, their conduct would grow more and more relaxed and even licentious, and they would altogether become a scandalous community. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, 15:31—34. Heb. 12:15—17.) As the Jews therefore used to search with candles in every corner of their houses, that they might cast out all the leaven, before they made the unleavened bread for the passover; so ought they to purge out such crimes and offenders. (Note, Ex. 13:3—7.) Evils of the kind referred to, though in some respects congenial with their old state of idolatry, were utterly inconsistent with the purity of a Christian church; which should be "a new lump;" the members of which should resemble the unleavened bread used at the passover. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, Eph. 4:17—19. 5:8—14. 1 Thes. 5:4—11. 1 Pet. 4:3—5.) The Jews, indeed, had only the type and shadow of good things to come, in their appointed feast: but Christ himself, the true "Passover, had been sacrificed" for his people, to atone for their sins, and to be the spiritual sustenance of their souls. It behooved them therefore to "keep the feast, not with the old leaven" of heathen licentiousness, nor yet with "the leaven of malice," ambition, and contention; but with that simplicity and sincerity of repentance and holy obedience, which were the truth and substance shadowed forth by the unleavened bread. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, Ex. 12:3—10. Matt. 16:5—12.) This might either be applied to the habitual feast of communion with God, by faith in Christ, or to their commemorating his death in the Lord's supper; and it included both personal purity, and the purity of the religious society.—Some expositors confidently maintain, that the incestuous person was one of the teachers who opposed the apostle; or the opposing teacher, supposing, that the apostle had a single false teacher in his mind. But in the second epistle, where he directs the Corinthians to comfort the incestuous person, as brought to deep repentance, and as in danger of being "swallowed up of over much sorrow;" he speaks of "false apostles, ministers of Satan, transformed into the ministers of righteousness," in a manner which wholly subverts this supposition. (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:5—11. 7:12. 11:13—15.)—'Lewdness is the old leaven to be purged out; because the Corinthians were infamous for it to a proverb.' Whitby.

V. 9—13. Probably the apostle had in some previous epistle, which has not been preserved, warned the Corinthians not to associate with fornicators, or persons who were known to live in any kind of lewdness. (Marg. Ref. z.) Some expositors indeed are of opinion, that the apostle did not refer to any epistle, which he had before written; but to what he had enforced in the preceding verses of this chapter. But this certainly is not the most obvious meaning of the passage. And why should we suppose, that all his letters, any more than all his sermons, must be preserved as a part of the sacred volume? (Notes, John 21:24,25. Col. 4:15,16.) Can it be thought probable, on reflection, that this zealous apostle, so admirably qualified to give epistolary instruction, who lay so long in prison, and was, in various ways, so much kept at a distance from his friends and children, should in the course of his whole ministry, write no more letters than are now extant?—However this may be, he did not mean to prohibit all intercourse with fornicators, or with covetous men, or with such as oppressed the poor by iniquitous exactions, or even with idolaters, provided they were not professed Christians: for so extremely general were these crimes, that such a prohibition would be equivalent to a command, to leave their families and occupations, and to become hermits and recluses; which would by no means be for their good, or for the honour of God. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes and P. O. Matt. 5:13—16.) He would therefore now more explicitly say, that if one, "called a brother," a member of the Christian church, was guilty of fornication, or similar crimes, or of reviling, or intemperance: he ought not only to be excommunicated, but his society should be shunned as infectious by every believer: and they all ought to refuse even "to eat with him," till he had given evidence of his sincere repentance. Thus the infection might be stopped, and the scandal prevented; and the most effectual method would be taken to convince offenders of their guilt and danger. (Marg. Ref. d—l. Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Thes. 3:6—9,14,15. 3 John 9—12.)—The apostle did not think himself required, or authorised, to determine any thing concerning those, who were not professed Christians; but did it not belong to them, to exercise a judicial authority over the members of their own church, and to censure the scandalous? (Note, 6:1—6.) As for those "without," they must be left to the judgment of God, who would not permit them to escape unpunished. Therefore, let the Corinthians proceed to do their duty, by "putting away from among them" this notorious offender, without regarding the displeasure which might be excited by it: otherwise the apostle would be compelled to "come unto them with a rod," and to exert his miraculous powers in inflicting punishments on them. (Note, 4:18—21, v. 21.)—As no mention is made of excommunicating the incestuous woman; it may be concluded, that she was not a professed Christian, but a heathen, one of those "without," and perhaps specially meant. (Marg. Ref. m—q.)—Dr. Hammond, and some others, by learned criticisms, interpret almost all the words here used, of some kind or degree of lewdness. Thus "the covetous, the extortioners," and even "the railers," are supposed to mean debauched or licentious characters: as if "covetousness, extortion, and reviling" were not totally inconsistent with Christianity; (Note, 6:9—11.) or as if such a writer as St. Paul, would have needlessly accumulated words, in speaking of one species of wickedness; and not have dropped a single hint concerning other kinds of wickedness, which are equally abominable in the sight of God. (Notes, Eph. 5:3,4. Col. 3:5,6.)—To company. (9) 1 Christians were not allowed to keep up such a degree of intimacy with scandalous professors of the gospel, as to "eat with them;" much less ought they to intermarry with them (Notes, 7:39,40. 2 Cor. 6:14—18)—Without. (12) Notes Col. 4:5,6. 1 Thes. 4:9—12. 1 Tim. 3:7.

CHAPTER VI.

The Corinthians are reproved for going to law before heathen magistrates, instead of settling their differences among themselves, 1—6, and for selfishness and dishonesty, 7, 8. Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor covetous persons, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall "inherit the kingdom of God," 9, 10. Some of the Corinthians had been such, but they were "washed, and sanctified, and justified," 11. All lawful things are not expedient, 12. Christians, whose bodies are the members of Christ, and the temple of the Holy Spirit, must flee fornication, as a sin against their own bodies, 13—19; that, as bought with a price, they may glorify God in body and soul, 20.

DARE any of you, having [a] a matter against another, [b] go to law before the unjust, and not before [c] the saints?

2 Do ye not know that [d] the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge [e] the smallest matters?

3 Know ye not that we shall [f] judge angels how much more, things that [g] pertain to this life?

4 If then [h] ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge [i] who are least esteemed in the church.

5 I speak [k] to your shame. [l] Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren?

6 But [m] brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. How grievous is it, that those crimes should sometimes be notoriously committed by professors of the gospel, which heathens would be ashamed of! "Wo be to the world because of offences!" And "wo be to them by whom the offences come!" yea, to those also by whom they are connived at! (Note, Matt. 18:7—9.)—Spiritual pride, ambition, and false doctrines and teachers, directly tend to introduce and perpetuate these scandals: for men's gifts, influence, notions, and connexions are, in such circumstances, more regarded than their conduct. So that, religious societies, as well as individuals, are generally most "puffed up," when they have most need to be ashamed and to mourn. (Notes, Rev. 3:14—17. P. O. 14—22.) and sometimes those men are gloried in, especially when eminent in gifts and influence, who must be taken away, as mortified limbs, before the church can prosper in vital godliness. When a man has wisdom, zeal, and love, he can have but one judgment in cases of this kind: and if he possess authority or influence, he will use it, whether present or absent, in exciting those who are more immediately concerned, to prefer the honour of the gospel to every personal or party interest; to venture all consequences in bearing testimony against scandalous crimes; and to separate from among them those who have done such deeds.—It is indeed highly desirable, that all the ministers and churches of Christ were enabled to exercise this salutary discipline, in the name and by the authority of their Lord; and to deliver over into the visible kingdom of Satan, all who evidently disgrace their profession: and that those, who have such discipline among them, should uniformly exercise it with exact impartiality, not respecting persons, and with due solemnity and tender compassion to the souls of offenders. But alas! it hath been so generally perverted by men's carnal passions, or rendered inefficient by family connexions, secular motives, and party influence, and an undue regard to the rich above the poor, that a more complete revival of pure and spiritual religion seems necessary, before it can produce its full effect. Far more, however, might be done in most places than now is; if fear of man, respect of persons, and carnal policy, did not deter those concerned, from decidedly acting according to their judgment. But alas! many even glory in their prosperous state, when evils greatly prevail, which fully authorize us to say, "Your glorying is not good." Few seem sufficiently aware, that "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" and that the honour and success of the gospel, and the flourishing of the church, requires that "the old leaven" be diligently sought out and purged away; though the numbers and wealth of the society should be greatly diminished by it: and that no one should be considered as a part of the true church, who does not appear to have renounced and mortified his old sins; that thus the whole company may be a new and unleavened mass. (Notes, Luke 14:25—27. John 15:2. 2 Tim. 2:14—19. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) So far is the sacrifice of "Christ our Passover," from rendering this personal and public sanctification unnecessary; that it furnishes the most cogent reasons and effectual motives and assistances for it; else we can neither live by faith in him, nor join in his ordinances with comfort and profit. This feast cannot be solemnized, these provisions cannot be relished, along with "the old leaven" of sensual indulgence, or that "of malice and wickedness;" but must be attended with "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." Yet, alas! festivals observed in commemoration of the great events, on which all our hopes depend, are very generally celebrated with "the old leaven," and the leaven of wickedness in varied forms.

V. 9—13. When individuals, who "mourn over" those who have done evil, cannot prevail to have them put away from among them; they should refuse to associate with them, and protest against their scandals by withdrawing from them; and, though we ought not to be severe on the infirmities, or even the occasional falls, of such as are humbled for them; yet when any one, who professes the gospel, is "a fornicator, or covetous, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner," charity itself, the love of men, and the best, the eternal interests even of the offender himself, require of us to avoid all fellowship with him, even more than we do with persons guilty of similar crimes, who make no profession of religion; lest we should appear to allow of his sins, because he is of our party and sentiments. But how grievous is it, that we "must needs" still "go out of the world," (though called Christian,) if we should resolutely refuse all intercourse with such characters as are here described! So prevalent is vice on every side. We must, however, leave "those that are without," and who are strangers or enemies to the doctrines of grace, to the judgment of God. We should first judge ourselves, and take heed to give no offence to others; then we should shun such professors of the gospel as would be an offence to us, and a reproach to the cause: and thus attending to our own duty in this respect, we should wait and pray for times of greater purity in the church of God.

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1—6. The apostle here keenly reproved another lamentable evil in the Corinthian church. He abruptly inquired, as a man in astonishment, whether any of them could venture to go to law with their brethren, before the heathen magistrates, who were unrighteous before God, and might be expected to be unjust judges in such matters. Surely, they ought to have decided all their differences, (if such indeed arose,) by the arbitration of "the saints," the holy disciples of Christ. (Marg. Ref. a—c Note, Matt. 18:15—17. P. O. 15—22.) What! with all their superior knowledge, did they not know that believers, being first declared righteous and heirs of God, at the day of judgment will be assessors with Christ in judging the world, and will concur in the sentence denounced by him against the wicked? (Notes, Matt. 19:27,28. Luke 22:28—30. Rev. 2:24—28. 3:20—22.) And if this honour was intended them, were they not worthy to be intrusted with the decision of such causes, as related only to the comparatively trifling concerns of this life? Indeed, even fallen angels, whose slaves they once were, and by whom they were long harassed, will be judged by them: and the punishment of those proud and malignant spirits will be imbittered by this mortifying circumstance. (Marg. Ref. d—g.) If, then, the Corinthians had causes relative to secular matters, to be "judged" or decided on; they need not either take off the ministers of the gospel from their sacred employment, or select such as were qualified for other more arduous and important services: even brethren of inferior abilities and estimation in the church were competent for this office. At present, they acted in a manner very disgraceful to themselves: for, after having greatly gloried in their wisdom and gifts, there seemed to be "not so much as one wise man among them," not one who could be trusted as an arbitrator between his brethren! So that disputes between Christians were carried before the unbelieving magistrates, who would thence naturally conclude them to be a selfish and litigious set of men. (Marg. Ref. k—m.) Doubtless, therefore, there was a great fault among them, which could not be palliated: their contests proved them carnal and selfish: this effect of them was exceedingly dishonourable to the gospel; and their connivance at these scandals proved, that the church was far from being in a flourishing state.—The Jews were allowed to settle matters of property among themselves, according to their own law; and Christians would perhaps have been permitted to exercise the same kind of authority over their own company: yet voluntary reference to arbitration seems rather to be intended.—"The apostle is not treating concerning the causes to be judged, between believers and unbelievers, nor of the public administration of justice, but of those differences which nothing hindered from being settled by private arbitration.... If the Corinthians had been such as they ought to have been; this question would have been superfluous: for no one would have given his brother any occasion for litigation.... To decide such matters as these, they ought by no means to employ the pastors, or teachers or other rulers, of the church, or the deacons; who were fully occupied in their sacred functions: but rather they should choose some of those 7 Now therefore [n]there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another: [o]why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded.

8 Nay, [p]ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren.

(afterwards called the laity,) who being less taken up in sacred services, might be more at leisure to attend to these secular concerns.' Beza. (Note, Acts 6:2—6.)—'If you still retain your secular judicatures, you set them to be judges over you, who are despised in the church.' Whitby. This learned writer reads the clause interrogatively: "Do ye set them to judge, who are despised in the church?" That is, the heathen magistrates. But did the church avowedly despise those very magistrates, whom the apostles commanded them to honour and obey? Mr. Locke understands it of private persons not appointed to the magistracy: but it does not appear, that the original word was ever used in that sense. In fact, none of the interpretations above given considered as detached from local circumstances, are fully satisfactory: for the meanest Christian could not be despised, and set at naught, in the church; except as that church was corrupted. But may not the apostle refer to the vainglory and self-wisdom of the leading persons at Corinth; who would, by necessary consequence, despise such as were inferior to themselves in knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts, in proportion as they exalted themselves? Yet the meanest real and experienced Christians whom they proudly "set at naught," were competent to decide such causes, as they brought before the heathen magistrates; nay, far more competent than their despisers.

V. 9-11. (Note, 5:9—13.) The apostle here plainly declares his doubts concerning the real conversion of some professed Christians at Corinth, seeing their conduct was so contrary to the precepts of God's word. What! did they not know that the unjust or dishonest should "not inherit the kingdom of God?" There is very great energy in these inquiries, when we consider that they were addressed to a people, who were puffed up with an imagination of their superiority to others in wisdom and knowledge. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 1—6,12—17. 4:8—13.)—If, however, they did not pay a proper regard to so plain and evident a truth, he must warn them not to "be deceived;" not to deceive themselves, or each other; and to take heed that Satan did not deceive them: for they would certainly find, that persons who lived in the practice of any of the vices and iniquities which he proceeded to enumerate, would be excluded from heaven at last, whatever their profession, gifts, or creed had been. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Gal. 5:19—21. Eph. 5:5—7. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:14,15.)—The apostle did not, however, mean, that those who had been guilty of these or similar abominations were excluded from salvation; for even some of the true Christians at Corinth had been habitually criminal in many of these respects; and probably most of them in one or other of them. But then they had been washed, not only by the water of baptism, but in "the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness;" (Note, Zech. 13:1.) so that they were "sanctified" from the love and practice of sin, and to the love and service of God, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, as well as pardoned and justified by faith "in the name of the Lord Jesus." (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, Ps. 51:1,2,7. Is. 1:16—20. Ez. 36:25—27. John 13:6—11. Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 3:4—7. Rev. 1:4—6. 7:13—17.) Thus their character and conduct were changed, as well as their state: but if any one of them still practised these vices, he deceived himself, if he supposed himself to be an accepted believer. The arrangement of the expressions in the 11th verse shows, that no argument can be drawn merely from that circumstance, in respect of controverted points of doctrine. 'Here is the figure called Hyperbaton: for we "are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus," and "sanctified by the Spirit of our God." (So Philem. 5.)... To be justified still signifies (in all Paul's epistles) to be absolved from the guilt of sin, and approved as righteous, either at present, or before God's tribunal. And so, "the name of Christ," when we are said to be justified by it, must signify, not the profession of Christianity, but faith in Christ dying for us; and be the same as... "in him shall all that believe be justified."' Whitby.—'The apostle begins with those vices with which a rich and luxurious city abounded, seriously warning them, that repentance and forgiveness, justification and sanctification, are joined by an indissoluble bond.' Beza.—Inherit, &c. (9,11.)—"The kingdom of God," or "of heaven," is "entered into," when we truly believe: (Notes, Matt. 3:2. John 3:3—5.) that is, the kingdom of grace in this life; and all the true subjects of this kingdom, will inherit 'the kingdom of glory' in another world, and they alone. V. 12—17. It is surprising that expositors should so generally speak of Judaizing teachers, as the authors of the divisions at Corinth: when their philosophizing disposition, and their erroneous notions of Christian liberty, plainly show them to have been speculating Gentile converts, who ran into the opposite extreme, and introduced a specious system of antinomianism. As all meats might lawfully be eaten, the ceremonial law being no longer in force: (Notes, 8:7—13. 10:23—33. Rom. 14:2—4.) they were disposed to extend the same principle even to fornication, as if that too were only prohibited by the ceremonial law, or as if the moral law also had lost its force! (Note, Acts 15:19—21.)—This false principle, added to their heathen maxims and habits, seems to have made way for their connivance at the conduct of the incestuous person. (Note, 5:1—5.) Now, says the apostle, admitting the truth of this position, that "all things are lawful" to a Christian, which might be granted in respect of meats; yet "all things are not expedient" to him; that is, consistent with his real benefit, and that of his brethren or neighbours: so that even this liberty must be used under cer tain limitations. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Rom. 14:13—23.) Moreover, a Christian should habituate all his natural inclinations to subjection; and not allow them, by unrestricted indulgence, even in lawful things, to obtain such a power over him, that he cannot refrain when it is requisite that he should. (Note, 9:24—27.) Indeed, all kinds of food were created for the support of the body, and for no other purpose; and the stomach and bowels were formed to receive, digest and convert them into nourishment: yet both the meat and the body, in respect of its present subsistence, will soon be destroyed, according to the appointment of God. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, Matt. 15:15—20.) But he did not form the body, to be employed in fornication, and the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes; which counteract, and, if universal, would entirely defeat the design of the Creator, in making them male and female; namely, the increase of the human species, the proper training up of children, and all the comforts and advantages of relative and domestic life, as springing from honourable marriage. (Note, Gen. 2:24. P. O. Prov. 5:15—23.) But even this was a very subordinate end for which their bodies were created: as they were "for the Lord," to be employed in his service; especially the bodies of believers were "for the Lord Jesus," to be "presented as living sacrifices" to him, and employed as instruments of righteousness to his glory: (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, Rom. 6:12—19. 12:1.) and the Lord Jesus was appointed to be the Saviour, Proprietor, and happiness of the body as well as of the soul: for God had raised him up from the grave, as the earnest of the resurrection of all his people by his power, to glory and immortality. (Notes, Rom. 8:10,11. 14:7—9. Phil. 3:20,21.) And did they not know, that their bodies were thus members of Christ's mystical body, the Church? (Notes, 12:12—26.) Was it then meet that the body of a believer, which stood in so high and honourable a relation to the Lord of glory; the incarnate Son of God, should be disgraced and abused by a base intercourse with a harlot? They ought to know, that this was to become one body, or flesh with a licentious woman, by a most degrading and pernicious deviation from the original institution of marriage. Whereas, he that was united to the Lord was "one spirit" with him; this union was formed by the communication of the Holy Spirit, and was of a spiritual and sacred nature, comprising a conformity of judgment and disposition, and a sympathy of soul: and could a Christian think of being "one spirit" with Christ, and one flesh with a harlot? V. 18—20. As fornication was so inconsistent with Christian holiness; and as the temptation of the Corinthians to it, from former bad habits, the example of their neighbours, and abundant opportunities, would be very many; they ought to "flee from it," as from an enemy whom they dared not to face; they should shun all incentives to it, and reject every thought of it, or solicitation to it, at once, and with prompt decision. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 1 Tim. 6:11,12. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.)—For it might further be observed, that other sins in general have their chief effect upon the mind, rather than on the body, and commonly injure others more immediately than the man himself: but lewd persons not only sin against God, their neighbours, and their own souls, but against their own bodies also; dishonouring and abusing them to the basest purposes, and bringing upon them the most painful, loathsome, and destructive diseases. Thus they, as it were, take their bodies, and, by an act of cruelty to themselves, and gradual suicide, present them for sacrifices to the filthiest demons. The case is the same, in some degree, in other kinds of sensual excess; but far more in respect of this vice than any other: as every one must know, who is acquainted with the horrible effects of lewdness in populous cities; and with the very great multitudes who are annually cut off, in early life, and in the most deplorable manner imaginable by the various diseases, with which it has pleased God to show his abhorrence of it. (P. O. Prov. 2:10—22. 5:1—14. 6: 6—35.)—Moreover, Christians ought to know, that their bodies were consecrated to be "the temples of the Holy Spirit who dwelt in them," as the gift of the Father through the Son, to consecrate them to God, and prepare them for his glory; so that in this respect too they were no longer "their own," but the property of God the Spirit, who had taken possession of them as his holy habitation. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 3:16,17. John 14:15—17. Rom. 8:10,11. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22.) For they had been redeemed from merited condemnation and hopeless slavery, by the atoning sacrifice of Christ; who, having thus "bought them with a price," had acquired for himself, and for the Father and the Spirit as One with him, a new and endearing right to them and their services, in addition to that which he had as their Creator. (Marg. Ref. y, z. 7:22,23. (Notes, Acts 20:28. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Tit. 2:14. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. 2:9, 10.) So that, being wholly and on every account the Lord's, they were bound to devote both body and soul to his glory, in every service to which he called them, and to make no other use of either body or soul, than was consistent with that holy and entire devotedness to God.—The language of this chapter is remarkable: "God," the Father, will "raise the bodies of believers by his own power." (14. Notes, John 5:24—29. Phil. 3:20,21.) Their bodies are members of Christ, and for him, as he for them; his property, to be devoted to him, having been "bought with the price" of his blood. And they are also "the temples of the Holy Ghost," and thus his property, so that they are not their own, but God's, to glorify him. Does not all this demonstrate, that St. Paul considered the God, to whom Christians especially belonged, as subsisting in three divine persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to each of whom he shows their peculiar relation? This accords with the form of baptism and benediction. (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13: 14.)—'The question, "Know ye not this?" is repeated six times in this one chapter; which may seem to carry with it a just reproach to the Corinthians, who had got a new and better instructer than himself, in whom they so much gloried.' Locke.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The high privileges and glorious prospects of believers should suggest arguments to them against sin, and for the practice of every duty: that so, a just sense of the dignity gratuitously bestowed on them, so mean and worthless in themselves, may render them superior to the debasing allurements of vice, and the love of worldly vanities. Surely, "the saints" of God, and the assessors of Christ in judgment on men and angels, should not so eagerly contend with each other about secular interests, as to make their appeal to those who are strangers to true religion! Surely, they are competent to decide such comparatively insignificant causes among themselves! If there were not "utterly a fault among them," disputes of this kind would rarely occur: and if at any time they became unavoidable; it would be easy to decide them by arbitration, were not professors of the gospel often too tenacious of their supposed right, in secular matters, and partial in their own cause: for real Christians, even of moderate abilities, might generally determine these matters with sufficient equity, if they were impartially set before them, and unreservedly left to their decision. It must, however, be a shame to any religious company, if there is no man among them so wise and faithful, that his brethren dare trust him to determine their secular differences. Indeed, lawsuits with "those that are without" need seldom be had recourse to, if Christians were disinterested, and forbearing in due measure; and if they would, in all tolerable matters, suffer themselves to be defrauded and injured, for the sake of peace, and the credit of the gospel. (Note, Phil. 4:5—7.) But "brother" would never "go to law with brother before" human tribunals, if there were not a very great fault on one side, or on both: and much deliberation, counsel, prayer, and endeavour for accommodation should precede, before a man "dare" to enter upon so perilous and disgraceful a business. But alas! many, who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, not only refuse to bear and forgive injuries, but they "do wrong and defraud, and that their brethren!" Whether such men act in direct opposition to their consciences, or are misled by false principles; they should be reminded, that "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God;" fo-

3 Let the husband [e]render unto the wife due benevolence: and likewise also the wife unto the husband.

4 The [f]wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife.

5 Defraud ye not one the other, [g]except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, [h]that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

6 But I speak this [i]by permission, and not of commandment.

7 For [k]I would that all men were even as I myself: [l]but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

8 I say therefore [m]to the unmarried and widows, it is good for them if they abide even as I.

9 But if they cannot contain, [n]let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

no one, continuing an adulterer, a fornicator or licentious, a dishonest, covetous, fraudulent, drunken, or malicious man, can have either title to the holy habitation of God and his saints, or meetness for it. Numbers deceive themselves and others in these matters; but the thing is impracticable; and the hope of it, the grossest and most fatal presumption. As many, however, who are now true Christians were once enslaved to these crimes; so they, who are now the most abandoned, may become Christians: but then they must be "washed and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." (Note, Tit. 3:3—7. P. O. 1—8.)

V. 12—20. Satan takes advantage of men's ignorance, pride, and lusts, to drive them from one extreme to another. Thus, when they are led to renounce superstitious scruples, they run into inexpedient or even unlawful indulgences. But "the wisdom from above" teaches a man to guard against mistakes on each side; to abstain from "lawful" things when "inexpedient," when unprofitable or injurious to himself or others; and to exert an authority over his own inclinations, that he may not be "brought under the power of any" of them. This is a difficult lesson, but of the highest importance: and if we consider, how soon all animal pleasures, and our present life, will terminate; the reflection may teach us moderation in the most innocent gratifications, and arm us against temptations to such as are unlawful, or unseasonable, or immoderate. Our bodies should be considered, as "for the Lord," and be devoted to his service, that they may at length share his resurrection, and be made like to his glorious body. (Notes, Phil. 3:20,21.) How degrading then, how base, how ungrateful, how sacrilegious, to make "the members of Christ the members of a harlot!" Or to defile the temple of the Holy Spirit, and to alienate the Lord's peculiar property, to the vile purposes of fornication! It is, however, needful to fortify our minds on every side, against these dangerous temptations, by which so many eminent men have been cast down, and shamefully overcome: (Notes, Judg. 16: 2 Sam. 11: 1 Kings 11:1—8. Neh. 13:23—30.) and in this view, even the horrid diseases incident to those, who thus "sin against their own bodies," may be profitably reflected upon, especially by the young and inexperienced; in order to caution them to flee from so destructive a vice, and to keep at the utmost distance from all its fascinating allurements. But nobler motives should animate the believer's soul: being united to Christ, "as one spirit," and bought with a price of inestimable value; he should consider himself as wholly the Lord's, by the most endearing and indissoluble ties; that, seeking all happiness in his favour, and liberty in his service, he may live wholly devoted to him, and may, "glorify him in body and spirit, which are his."

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1—5. It is evident that those who retained their regard to the apostle's authority at Corinth, had written to him desiring his decision of several questions, which had been started among them; and he here proceeded to answer their inquiries, especially respecting marriage. While some of them pleaded for the lawfulness of fornication, others seem to have imbibed the sentiments of the Pythagoreans, or other philosophers; and to have deemed marriage itself inconsistent with Christian purity, or at least unfavourable to intellectual improvement. On the other hand, the Pharisees generally taught, that it was sinful for a man to live unmarried beyond his twentieth year; but at the same time, they laid down many frivolous and superstitious rules, concerning the conduct of married persons. In determining, therefore, this matter, the apostle first allowed, that, in many cases and circumstances, it might be profitable, or becoming, for a man to live unmarried, and might render him more useful to others; provided he were able and willing to live with that entire chastity which the single life required. Nevertheless, "because of fornications," on account of those propensities which God originally, for wise reasons, implanted in human nature, and which man's sinfulness has rendered generally too predominant to be kept in absolute subjection; in order to prevent fornication, and every kind of lewdness, and to remove the temptation; "let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband." In all cases this was allowable; in very many it was far best that it should be so. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) Nor ought they to imagine it a virtue in them to live apart; or that it was even allowable for one of them to withdraw without the consent, or contrary to the inclinations, of the other: but in every respect, they should consider mutual compliance and affection an incumbent duty; and the proper means of living in harmony and purity, and at a distance from temptation; remembering that they had an unalienable property in each other's person, in respect of all the purposes for which marriage was appointed. (Note, Ex. 21:7—11.) This places the husband and the wife entirely on the same ground; and as much forbids him to take another woman, as it does her to cohabit with another man: so that it is absolutely decisive against polygamy. (Notes, Matt. 19:7—9. Mark 10:2—12.)—Neither ought married persons to deprive each other of the appointed preservative against temptation: so that they ought not to separate, but "by consent," and that they might be at leisure for the spiritual exercises of fasting and prayer on special occasions (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, Ex. 19:10—15, v. 15. 1 Sam. 21:3—6.) and even this should not generally be for any long time; lest Satan should take advantage of their weakness, to harass and defile their minds by improper thoughts, or even to tempt them to unlawful actions.

V. 6—9. The apostle stated the things, which have been considered, as what were allowable; but not as giving an absolute commandment. Men might use their own discretion about marrying; and married persons concerning their conduct in that state: provided they did not needlessly thwart each other's inclinations, do injustice to one another, or throw any temptation in their own or each other's way. For he could have desired that all his Christian brethren had been as free from disquietude in that respect, as he himself was; that, if the glory of God and the circumstances in which they were placed required it, they might live unmarried with as much content as he did. Some think that he was a widower, but this is uncertain. We cannot suppose, that he wished marriage to cease among Christians; but only that every one might be enabled calmly to use his prudence in that respect, without being necessitated to marry, when otherwise it would not have been adviseable. But the apostle knew, that his experience, in this matter, was not a rule for other men: as this superiority to the animal inclinations was a special gift of God, which he gave to one and not to another, as he saw good; and that in different proportions. (Notes, 4:6,7. Matt. 19:10—12, v. 12) He would therefore remind unmarried persons, and such as had been left in widowhood, that their condition had many advantages, which rendered it good for them to abide in it: but, if any of them found that they could not obtain the gift of entire continence, it was allowable, and even incumbent on them to marry; as it would be far better for them, more holy in itself, and more becoming their Christian profession, to marry than to be harassed with polluting temptations, and continually in danger of being drawn into forbidden gratifications.—'This whole passage is framed against those, who condemn second marriages, when the first has been dissolved by death.' Beza. (*Marg. V. 10—14. As to married persons, the apostle did not counsel, but "command" them; and not by his own authority, but by that of Christ, that they should not separate from each other; which was common among the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, and that on very frivolous pretences. The wife must not leave her husband: or, if she had previously been separated from him, she must not marry again; rather, she ought to make every advance and concession, to bring about a reconciliation with him: and the same rules were to be observed by the husband. Doubtless, the exception is implied, which our Lord made, in the directions given by him in this particular. (Note, Matt. 5:31,32.)—Though he had not given express rules in the following cases; yet the apostle considered himself fully authorized to enjoin, that the Christian, who was married to an unbeliever, whether a heathen or a Jew, that chose to live with him notwithstanding this difference of religion, should not put her away; as the Jews, for reasons peculiar to their situation, were required to put away their heathen wives. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Ezra 10:) Christians, indeed, ought not to marry unbelievers: yet if that relation had been entered into, either before conversion, or through inattention to the rule, or by mistake; it would cause great confusion and scandal to dissolve it on that account. The same held good in respect of a Christian woman, who had an unbelieving husband, that chose to live with her.—Nor ought any person to suppose, that this union, as "one flesh" with unbelievers or idolaters in lawful marriage, was inconsistent with being "one spirit with the Lord," as fornication had been declared to be: (Note, 6:12—17.) for the unbelieving husband or wife was "sanctified" to the believer, by the appointment and command of God; so that their marriage was holy and honourable. If this had not been so appointed, and if Christians had been commanded to put away their unbelieving partners, as the Jews did their idolatrous wives; the children of such marriages would have been accounted relatively "unclean," and so excluded from baptism, even as those of the Jews in the above-mentioned case were from circumcision: but on the contrary, they were accounted holy in the Christian churches, and thus admitted among them, as a part of the visible kingdom of God. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—This exposition of the Scripture before us has indeed been much controverted; and some have explained "holy," or "unclean," to mean legitimate, or illegitimate: but in all the places, where these words are found in Scripture, there is not one which will admit of this sense. No doubt, the children of the heathen, who were lawfully married, were as legitimate as those of Christians; yet they were never said to be "holy." Something more must be meant, by the believer "sanctifying" the unbelieving party, than merely legalizing their marriage; for that would have been valid and lawful, if both had been unbelievers: and the children would not really be more "holy," in respect of their nature, if one parent was a believer, than if both were unbelievers. But as the word "unclean" is frequently used in a relative sense, denoting unfit to be admitted to God's ordinances, and "holy" the contrary; as in this sense the male children of the Jews were "holy," and so partakers of circumcision; while those of the Gentiles, and even such as had one idolatrous parent, were "unclean," and excluded from circumcision: I cannot but conclude, after long attention to the subject, that the baptism of the infant-offspring of Christians is here evidently referred to, as at that time customary in the churches; and that the Corinthians knew, that this was not objected to, when only one parent was a Christian.—'Hence then the argument for infant-baptism runs thus: If the holy seed among the Jews was therefore to be circumcised; and to be made federally holy by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy people; because they were born in sanctity, or were seminally holy; for "the root being holy, so are the branches also:" then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive the sign of the Christian covenant, "the laver of regeneration;" and so be entered into the society of the Christian church.' Whitby. (Notes, Ex. 19:6. Deut. 7:6—8. Ezra 9:1,2. Mal. 2:10—16. Rom. 11:16—21.)—'It would be proving a thing by itself, . . . to argue, that the converse of the parents was lawful, because the children were not bastards; whereas all, who thought the converse of the parents unlawful, must of course think that the children were illegitimate.' Doddridge.

V. 15, 16. The apostle further observed, that if the unbelieving wife, or husband, chose to depart, and to disannul the marriage according to the laws of the community; the believer was not required to act in opposition to it, or to be embarrassed, as if reduced to bondage by the preceding contract. Yet separations ought to be avoided, if this could be done: for God had called them to live "in peace" with all men, as far as possible; and therefore they ought so to act, that if a separation took place, no part of the blame should attach to the Christian. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) An union with an unbeliever indeed would occasion grief and trouble; yet that ought patiently to be endured: for how did the believing wife know, but that God would make use of her as an instrument in the conversion and salvation of her unbelieving husband? or, how did the husband know, but he might thus become a blessing to his unbelieving wife; by his pious, affectionate and exemplary behaviour, edifying converse, and fervent prayers? (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. Jam. 5: 19,20. 1 Pet. 3:1—4.) On the other hand, there was no positive assurance that this would be the case; and therefore no special reason for opposing the dissolution of the marriage. —The fathers in general interpret this, as allowing the deserted person to marry again.—'Such a total and perpetual desertion must, (on this interpretation,) dissolve the matrimony, and render the deserting person as dead to the other. . . . A brother or a sister is not enslaved, after all means of peace and reconciliation have been in vain attempted, and the unbeliever hath entered into another marriage, or rather hath dissolved the former by adultery, as may well be supposed of those heathens, who thus separated from their Christian mates. And this interpretation seems to be confirmed, from the former words, relating to the case of the believing wives and husbands; "if they depart, let them remain unmarried;" it being not to be supposed, that believers would dissolve the bond of matrimony by adultery. Therefore the apostle seems to grant this in the case of unbelievers, departing from Christians on the account of their faith.' Whitby.—Total and perpetual desertion, when accompanied by evident adultery in the deserting party, undoubtedly sets the other party at full liberty, according to the scriptural rule; for deserting a husband or wife to live with another man or woman, or in any way evidently adulterous, must as much dissolve the marriage, as a divorce explicitly given on account of adultery: and there is no restriction, in any part of the holy Scriptures, laid on divorced persons, to inhibit them from marrying, though very many, imposed by human laws, are often spoken of as if scriptural injunctions. (Notes, Matt. 19:1—9.)

V. 17—24. The preceding subject led the apostle to digress to a more general topic. In ordinary cases, and without some good reason to the contrary, it was proper that every man should continue to serve God, by the improvement of those gifts which he had distributed to him, and in that situation in which he had called him. This was the general rule, which the apostle enjoined in all the churches. Thus, if a Jew or circumcised proselyte had been converted, let him not deny his circumcision; or refuse that regard to the ceremonial law, which might tend to conciliate his unbelieving brethren: but let not the uncircumcised convert submit to that abrogated ordinance, or at all take that yoke upon him. For, in fact, the difference was in itself immaterial, unless men placed dependence on these things; but obedience to the commandments of God was the great concern. While the Mosaic dispensation continued in force, it was proper that its requirements should be complied with: and it might be still expedient for the Jewish converts to pay some regard to them: but the Gentiles had nothing to do with them, and ought exclusively to regard the precepts of the moral law, and the institutions of Christ, from a principle of faith in him, and love to him. (Marg. Ref. b—e.)—It is obvious, that the apostle is not here speaking of the way of justification, but of the conduct of justified believers. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, Gal. 5:1—6. 6:15,16.) The three particulars, which here, and in the texts referred to, the apostle selects, in this connexion, should not be considered as existing separately. For he who is "a new creature" possesses "faith which worketh by love," and this love constrains him to "keep the commandments of God." (Notes, John 14:15—24. 2 Cor. 5:13—17.)—It was also adviseable in general for every one to abide in that profession, trade, or station, in which the grace of God had called him to the knowledge of Christ; provided it were an honest employment. For the gospel would teach a man how to behave in any condition, and patiently to bear its inconveniences. If then any one had been converted in a state of slavery, (which was the common case of the servants in those days, that is, of a very large majority, in many cities and countries,) and he was the property of a heathen master; let him be less solicitous about his liberty, than about glorifying God in that trying situation. But, as it would frequently deprive him of religious advantages, especially that of meeting with his brethren on the Lord's day, or at other times: and as it would expose him to many temptations; if he was able, or had a fair opportunity of obtaining his freedom, he would do well to embrace it. The converted slave, however, was called to the noblest liberty, as a freedman of Christ, and emancipated from Satan's yoke: and the Christian, who enjoyed his outward liberty, should consider himself as "the servant of Christ," his property, and bound to devote himself to him, and obey his will. (Notes, 6:18—20. John 8:30—36. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) But as all Christians had been bought with an invaluable price, to be the Lord's servants; they ought not, by choice, or from secular motives, to "become" the servants of men; because that would interfere with their devoted obedience to their common Lord. Every man therefore ought contentedly to "abide with God," by constantly performing the duties of that situation, in which he was converted to the faith of Christ.—Ministers were, at that time, entirely taken from among the converts to Christ in every church, most of whom had doubtless been previously employed in other occupations; and seminaries for educating men for this service were not then known: it is therefore evident that the apostle did not mean to forbid that change of employment; when it could be made advisedly, and on good grounds, as well as from proper motives: and in other respects his general rule might admit of some exceptions.—They should not change, upon a presumption, that Christianity gave them a new and peculiar liberty so to do. Locke.—The context favours the supposition, that those changes which some might be induced to make, from an erroneous judgment, in respect of their liberty or duty as Christians, was the primary object which the apostle had in view: yet his general language seems to imply, that he meant to extend the rule to various other cases.—Dr. Whitby and some others explain the words, "Ye are bought with a price," of those slaves, who had been charitably ransomed at the expense of their fellow-Christians. But their fellow-Christians obtained no property in them by thus ransoming them, as Christ does by ransoming us; the advice is general, and not limited to these persons; and it is far more obvious to suppose that the apostle used this expression in the same sense in which he had before employed it. V. 25—28. The apostle here resumes his former subject, with especial reference to those who had never been married: for he seems to use the word, rendered "virgins," in this latitude, including both unmarried men and women. Christ had given no commandment in this matter, but had left them free to marry, or not, as they saw good; and the apostle had received no special revelation about it. He did not therefore speak authoritatively; but he gave them counsel, according to the spiritual judgment which he possessed, as one "who had obtained mercy to be faithful," in his stewardship of the divine mysteries; for he ascribed his faithfulness to the compassion and mercy of God, by a very remarkable expression, "pitied of the Lord to be faithful." (Marg. Ref. r, s. Note, 4:1,2.)—Considering the unsettled state of the church, and the persecutions to which it was or might be exposed, he considered it becoming and advantageous for them to live unmarried; that they might be less incumbered in removing from city to city, and have fewer temptations to shrink from banishment, imprisonment, and death; and that they might be more disengaged, and ready for any service, which should be proposed to them, for "the furtherance of the gospel;" as their anxieties, occupations, attachments, and impediments would be fewer, in the single than in the married state. But if a man were either married, or contracted to a woman under promise of marriage, he ought by no means to attempt the violation of his engagements, in order to possess more liberty for the service of God: though the unmarried might be counselled to avail themselves of their advantages, and not to involve themselves in additional difficulties, during those distressing times. Yet if either man or woman should deem it best, all things considered, to marry; they would break no law of God, and ought not to be blamed for so doing. Indeed, they would probably have additional outward trouble and suffering: but the apostle would not insist on this, or censure their conduct as imprudent; lest he should deter some from marrying whose duty it was to marry, or lest he should give occasion to any of representing that state as unholy. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 6—9. Jer. 16:2—4. Matt. 24:19,20. Luke 23:26—31.) 'Here Esthius takes care to add, that the apostle must be under

V. 29—31. In speaking on this subject, it was proper that Christians should be reminded of the shortness of life, and the transitory nature of earthly things, at all times. "The time is contracted as to the remainder:" thus some render the words. Only a small remnant of life remains.—Or, "it remained" to be observed, that married persons should reflect how speedily their union must be dissolved, that they might sit loose to the satisfactions of that endeared relation, and be habitually prepared for a separation: that those who mourned any temporal loss, should moderate their grief; (Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) that the prosperous and joyful also should repress and temper their rejoicing by more serious recollections; that those who were purchasing houses or lands should consider the uncertainty of their tenure, and not deem themselves owners of such fleeting possessions; and that those who were laying out worldly riches, or in any way using the gifts of Providence, should be careful not to abuse them, or to expect happiness from their pleasures and enjoyments: seeing "the fashion," the whole scheme, form, and show, of this world, "was passing away," as a pageant, or procession through the street, and would soon vanish as a phantom. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Pet. 4:7. 1 John 2:15—17.) So that the spirit of a pilgrim and traveller ought in all cases to be maintained.

V. 32—35. By the preceding counsel, the apostle intended to preserve believers from perplexing cares and anxieties, especially in that unsettled state of the church. For he was sensible, that an unmarried man, having grace proportioned to his state, and being enabled to live superior to its temptations, might wholly employ himself in contriving the best methods of serving and pleasing the Lord: and not having the charge and expense of a family, he might employ his time, talents, and substance more entirely in promoting the glory of God, and the good of mankind; and be ready to travel to any part of the world for this purpose, if an opportunity presented itself. But the believer who was married, must needs employ more of his thoughts and time about secular concerns; that he might provide for his family, attend to its concerns, and render things agreeable and comfortable to his wife, whom he was commanded to love and cherish as his own flesh: (Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) and this would sometimes exclude him from several active services, to which he might otherwise have been competent.—The difference between a virgin and a married woman was of a similar nature: the former might wholly dedicate her time and thoughts, her body and soul, to the service of God, in following after holiness and in doing good: but the latter must be engaged in the business of the family, and in other duties of her station, according to the will of her husband, whom God had commanded her to obey.—(Note, 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) So that, though marriage was most suited to men and women in general; yet individuals, who desired peculiar advantages for progress in personal religion, and for doing good, might possess them in an unmarried life; and to such it might be good not to marry, even if the times had been more favourable. (Marg. Ref. f—l.) This counsel of the apostle was far from warranting or persuading them to shut themselves up in convents, and thus to put the lighted candle under a bushel: on the contrary, it instructed them to "let their light shine before men," by an uninterrupted series of active services, for the glory of God and the benefit of the world. (Note, Matt. 5:14—16.) Yet he only gave them this counsel for their profit; and would not by any means "cast a snare on them," by persuading those to a single life, who had not a sufficient command over their own passions. He did not mean that this was required of them; but that in some cases it would be comely, and enable them to wait upon God in his ordinances and commandments, without having their thoughts or affections divided and distracted by other cares or attachments. (Marg. Ref. m—o.)

V. 36—38. Hitherto the apostle's meaning has been evident; but these verses are not without difficulty. Some explain them of a man's resolutely continuing in a single state; supposing the "necessity" mentioned, to be matter of personal consciousness, and not any thing arising from the conduct of another; but such a construction of the original is, by their own allowance, without example. Others would refer them to the case of a man, who had betrothed a virgin, and was in doubt whether he should complete the marriage. but "to marry" is not the same as "to give in marriage." It seems therefore most obvious to explain the passage of a parent, or guardian, who had the charge of a virgin. If one thus circumstanced thought that he acted unsuitably, in letting the virgin live single, till she had passed the prime of her life; and if any attachment, or other circumstance, rendered it needful; let him determine as he saw good; or, as it may be rendered, "as she willeth," without supposing it sinful to allow her to marry. But on the other hand, if a man was established in his judgment, that it was best for his daughter or ward to remain unmarried in those evil times; and if he saw "no necessity," from any thing in her behaviour, disposition, or attachments, to deviate from his own inclinations respecting her, and he so "determined in his mind" to keep her unmarried, he "did well." So that the parent or guardian, who gave a virgin in marriage to a proper person, "did well," and was by no means to be blamed, though she might, in consequence be exposed to additional difficulties, especially in those unsettled times; on which account, he who did not give his daughter or ward in marriage, did "better;" that is, he acted more for her real advantage, provided she were satisfied in the single state.

V. 39, 40. The law was still in force, which bound the wife to her husband as long as he lived; (Note, Rom. 7:1—4.) that is, except when legally divorced for a sufficient reason: but afterwards she might, without sin, marry any other man, provided he were a Christian, and, in the judgment of charity, a true believer. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 5:9—13. 2 Cor. 6:14—18.) The apostle, however, judged that widows would be happier, if they continued unmarried in the present state of the church: and, whatever some of the Corinthians might suppose, he considered himself as one guided by the Holy Spirit, in giving these counsels and instructions.—The language employed in several places of this chapter has led most expositors to conclude, that the apostle did not write by inspiration, in the particulars referred to: and doubtless these intimations, thus understood, would rather prove, than invalidate, his immediate inspiration in other parts of his writings. (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:1—4.) Yet there seems no sufficient ground for the distinction: sometimes he spoke by way of "permission," concerning what was allowable; sometimes by way of "counsel," concerning what was adviseable; and at other times "by commandment," concerning what was absolutely binding on their consciences. But in all this, he might be, and doubtless was, guided by the Spirit of inspiration: some things being expressly forbidden; others as expressly commanded; others allowed, as far as expedient or beneficial.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. That which is good in itself, may not always be best for a man, when every circumstance is weighed; and when all the variety of inward evils and outward temptations, connected with it, are duly considered: so that those things, which are good for one, must not so much as be recommended to another; because he is incapable of overcoming the difficulties and temptations to which they expose him. None indeed may be dispensed with in breaking the divine law: even this perfect rule leaves men at liberty to serve God in that way which is most suited to their capacity and various circumstances; of which others are commonly incompetent judges. Thus, if they, who find advantages for serving God in the single state, imagine that all others might do the same; they show themselves to be ignorant of the situation of fallen man in this ensnaring world: for there is no doubt, but many, who from various motives live unmarried, know that doing this proves a great hinderance to them in respect of their souls; and are unable, or unwilling, to persevere in that kind of celibacy, which the apostle describes as "good." To prevent therefore the fatal effects of unchastity, and of the strong propensity of most men to it, it is generally "expedient," and always allowable, that "every man should have his own wife, and every woman her own husband." All restrictions of this allowance uniformly tend to licentiousness; and no tongue can express the mischiefs, which arise from covetous, licentious, and constrained celibacy.—Every part of the conduct of married persons also ought to be so regulated, as to render them agreeable to each other, and satisfied in the relation. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) Whatever therefore, on either side, tends to give Satan an opportunity of tempting the other party, to any of those evils, which marriage was instituted to prevent, or to render it ineffectual for any of those ends for which the Creator appointed it; must be highly criminal, under whatever specious pretence it may be done: and the offending party is answerable to God, for the consequences of the deviation from his commandments. For, not only adultery and polygamy are inconsistent with the duties of this relation, and with the mutual property of married persons in each other; but also, whatever is disobliging and tends to weaken the attachment, and to open the way, for either of them to look with greater satisfaction on another object.—Every thing in the Christian's conduct should be regulated, in subserviency to his communion with God. Abstinence, and abstraction from lawful indulgences, may for a time be greatly subservient to that end: yet, when carried beyond proper bounds, they often produce contrary effects, and give Satan peculiar advantages against us.—Those who, like the apostle, are enabled to live with purity and contentment in an unmarried state, should copy his example, by laying themselves out with double diligence to glorify God, and to be useful to mankind: they should also imitate his prudence and candour, in not prescribing his own conduct to others, as obligatory on them in this respect; or despising those who are not endued with the same gift; remembering that in this also God has "made them to differ." In counselling our brethren also we should use caution; lest by exciting a man to grasp at advantages, which are out of his reach, we should cast him into circumstances of insuperable temptation; urge him to that which is contrary to his duty; and dissuade him from what is best for him, and indeed incumbent on him: for, in such matters, no man is competent to judge for another, but every one must determine for himself; or rather, he should seek counsel from God how he ought to act.

V. 10—16. It is the express commandment of God, that married persons should not separate from each other, if it can possibly be avoided; and that such as have separated, should endeavour to be reconciled, or else live single. It is also his will, that husbands and wives should be careful to please each other in lawful things, though it leave them less time for religious exercises, than they enjoyed in a single state.—Even if a believer has been married to an unbeliever, either before conversion, or by inattention to the rule of the sacred word; the cross of that incongruous union must be patiently endured, and the duties of the relation cheerfully performed; that by kindness, by a good example, and by fervent prayers, the unbelieving party may be won over, and the immortal soul saved. Nor need any doubt, but that, even in this case, the marriage state is sanctified to them; and they may still hope that their children will be made partakers of the spiritual grace, as well as the outward sign of baptism, by means of their redoubled diligence to "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."—In every state and relation, we should remember that God has "called us to peace;" and that every thing should be done to promote domestic and social harmony, as far as truth and holiness will permit.

V. 17—24, 29—31. It is proper that every man should walk with God, according to the gift distributed to him, and the duties of his station in the community. Believers ought not by any means to manifest an inconstant and unsettled temper. Even a disposition to change from one sect to another, on frivolous pretences, is frequently injurious and dishonourable; for these changes generally are as nothing, compared with that cheerful obedience to God's commandments, which both evidences our faith in Christ, and recommends his gospel to others.—So superior are a believer's privileges to all temporal things; that even the want of personal liberty, the most valuable of earthly blessings, should not much disquiet him: nor ought he to be careful about it, though called to serve God in a state of slavery. If "the Son of God has made him free" from sin and Satan, he has a far nobler liberty, even in bondage, than his unconverted master ever formed an idea of. The lowest condition of those, whom Christ has made free, is honourable: and, being "bought with a price," we are all his servants, and should abide with God in our proper place and work; well satisfied with his appointment, and not desirous of a change, unless a substantial reason can be given for it: nor ought a believer so to attach himself to any man, from secular motives, as to restrict himself as to his liberty in the service of God.—But, whatever our state or service may be, we should remember that "the time is short:" our temporal comforts and trials will soon be terminated; our season of preparation, or of usefulness, will speedily expire. (P. O. 1 Pet. 4:7—11.) Let us then study to sit loose to earthly satisfactions; to bear up under temporal sorrows; to be sober and considerate in prosperity, and cheerful in adversity; to deem heaven our sole inheritance; and "to use the things of the world as not abusing them, seeing the fashion" of this vain world is passing away like a shadow. Thus we may be helped forward by them in our pilgrimage; kept out of the way of temptation; and enabled to serve God and our generation to better advantage, as we pass through the world to heaven.

V. 25—28, 32—40. Those who have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and who have most studied the word of God and human nature, will be the most candid and cautious in giving their judgment, or passing their censures: for whatever may be good in respect of present difficulties or peculiar circumstances; they know that marriage is honourable, and fornication is abominable, in all persons and circumstances. They will therefore be careful not to speak, as if marriage were sinful in any; and they will be peculiarly cautious not to throw a snare upon those that pay deference to their judgment. And though they foresee that others "will have trouble in the flesh," by marrying in certain circumstances, and might in some respects be happier in a single state: yet they will "spare" them, without attempting to restrict the liberty which God hath allowed, or condemning them for what they do conscientiously. They will only counsel them for their profit, and to what is comely, and that they may "serve God without distraction."—Great discretion is also needful for parents and guardians, in their conduct respecting young persons; that they do not, by laying down rules and making determinations, according to their own views of what is most for their interest, lead them into dangerous temptations: for it may be "doing well" to permit young persons to marry, if their attachments or inclinations lead that way; when otherwise it would be "doing better" to prevent them: as even apparent imprudence, and its troubles, are better than sin and its deplorable consequences. How

CHAPTER VIII.

In respect of things offered to idols; humble "love" is preferable to that "knowledge which puffeth up," 1—3. We know that idols are nothing; for we worship only one God, through one Lord and Mediator, 4—6: yet this knowledge, an[1] the liberty connected with it, may be so used as to enfeeble or stumble weak believers, 7—11. In this case we sin against Christ, 12. The apostle would rather for ever abstain from meat, than stumble a weak brother, 13.

NOW, as [a]touching things offered unto idols, we know that [b]we all have knowledge. [c]Knowledge puffeth up, [d]but charity edifieth.

7 Howbeit [q]there is not in every man that knowledge: for some, [r]with conscience of the idol unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled.

8 But [s]meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, [t]are we the better; neither, if we eat not, [t]are we the worse.

9 But [t]take heed, lest by any means this [u]liberty of yours become [v]a stumblingblock to them that are [x]weak.

10 For if any man see thee [y]which hast knowledge [z]sit at meat in the idol's temple, [a]shall not the conscience of him which is weak be [‖]emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols; absurd then must vows of celibacy and perpetual virginity be! especially in young persons, who are as yet incapable of forming a judgment for future years: and are probably induced to do it, by the plans of others concerning them, and those plans often formed from secular motives, and what is thought the most desirable way of settling the different branches of the family: The general consequence of them will be, either the violation of their vows; or a life spent amidst temptation and mental defilement; or still worse. This was man's policy. How different from the wisdom of God, even in this chapter: which contains in it more in favour of a single life, than all the rest of the Scripture taken together does!—Believers, when under no other restriction, should be sure, in contracting marriage, to remember the limitation made by the apostle, "only in the Lord." What miseries have many endured through the remnant of their lives; and what bad consequences have they entailed upon their families, by transgressing it on one vain pretence or other! Let every one then beware in time, that they may not rashly take a step, which they may have cause deeply to bewail to the end of life.

11 And through thy knowledge [b]shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. It is probable, that some of the Corinthians had proposed this question to the apostle; 'Is it lawful for Christians to eat the flesh of those animals, which had been sacrificed to idols?'—It was customary with the idolaters to feast on these oblations, both in the temples and in their own houses; and many of them were publicly sold in the markets. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, 10:23—28.) On this flesh several of the Christians at Corinth feasted without scruple: declaring that they knew the idol to be a mere senseless log; and the supposed deity represented by it, a mere nonentity. This was, in some respects, taken from a misunderstanding of those Scriptures, which speak of idols as vanity. (Notes, 10:18—22. Is. 44:9—11. Jer. 10:6—15.) They therefore imagined that it was an evidence of superior knowledge, to eat of such sacrifices, even in the very temples of the idols! Now, says the apostle, we know that all of us, who are acquainted with the gospel, have this kind and measure of knowledge: but we are also aware, that such speculations "puff up" those who indulge in them with a vain conceit of their superior abilities and attainments, and foster a haughty, self-sufficient, unteachable temper; which is diametrically opposite to genuine Christianity, and prevents a man from making any progress in spiritual and experimental knowledge and wisdom: whereas, holy affections, and love to God, to heavenly things, and to the brethren, prepare men for receiving further instruction, and tend to their edification; and to qualify them to edify others also. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 13:4—7. Eph. 4:11—13. Jam. 3:13—18.) If any one therefore presumed, that he knew any thing pre-eminently, and so despised warnings and instructions; he certainly knew nothing, in that holy, humble, and sanctifying manner, in which he ought to know God, and his truth and will. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 3:18—23. 4:8. Matt. 18:1—4.) On the other hand, if any man really loved God, valued his favour, and sought his glory; he was thus evidenced to be "known" and approved of God. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, Ps. 1:4—6. Nah. 1:7,8. Matt. 7:21—23. John 10:14—18,26—31. Rom. 8:28—31. 11:1—6. Gal. 4:8—11. 2 Tim. 2:19.)

V. 4—6. In respect of the question proposed, it might be allowed, as well known among Christians, that an idol had no real existence, further than the senseless image, which specifically represented "nothing in the world." No such deities existed as those to whom the temples were consecrated; for indeed, there was "one true and living God, and no other than he." (Marg. Ref. i. Mark 12:32.)—The Gentiles indeed had many gods, celestial, terrestrial, and infernal; superior and inferior; who were adored, either as independent gods, or as intermediate beings, appointed to authority, in distinct departments, by their supreme deity; and mediators, in some sense between him and mankind. (Marg. Ref. h, k.)—But Christians knew, that there was but "one God, the Father; of whom," as the self-existent Author of all things, every creature proceeded, in whom all Christians had their spiritual life and happiness, and unto whom they were devoted: and "one Lord Jesus Christ," the appointed "Mediator between God and man," the Lord of his redeemed people, and of all things for their benefit; by whom all things at first were created, and by whom believers were redeemed and reconciled to God. (Marg. Ref. l—p. Note, 1 Tim. 2:5—7.) The Lord Jesus cannot here be spoken of, in respect of his original nature, as if inferior to the Father; any more than in those texts, which more directly speak of his mediatorial Person, character, office, and authority. (Note, John 14:27, 28.) The One God, even the Father, signifies the Godhead, as the sole object of all religious worship: and the Lord Jesus Christ denotes the Person of Emmanuel, "God manifest in the flesh," One with the Father and one with us, the appointed Mediator and Lord of all; through whom we come to the Father, and through whom the Father communicates all blessings to us, by the operations of the Holy Spirit. So that this passage proves, that Christ the Mediator is the Object of our worship, as One with the Father and the Spirit, in the unity of the Godhead; and as opposed to all others to whom divine adoration was rendered, or by whom it was claimed: or to whom it has since been abundantly and idolatrously rendered by professed Christians. (Note, Col. 2:18—20.)—'For thou only art holy; thou only art the Lord; thou only, O Christ, with the Holy Ghost, art most high in the glory of God the Father.' Communion Service. None essentially holy, no creature the object of worship, as Mediator, none else exalted, with the Holy Ghost, in the glory of "God the Father," except Jesus Christ. (Notes, John 5:24—29. Phil. 2:9—11.) This, at the reformation, was a noble protest against the worship of saints and angels as mediators, by the Papists. The Gentiles generally acknowledged one supreme deity, but they surrounded him with such a group of inferior gods and demons, that he seemed lost, or neglected in the crowd. Thus it has been in the corrupted Christian church, in respect of "the One living and true God," and the "One Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus." Though acknowledged in words, they have been and are so surrounded by angels and saints, as mediators and objects of religious worship; that the peculiar honour both of the Father, and of Christ "the Head," has been and still is given almost entirely to creatures.

judgment, knew indeed that an idol was the senseless representative of a nominal deity, which had no existence: and many of the Corinthians being "puffed up," with the groundless conceit of their own superior attainments, boasted of their own knowledge in this respect, and assigned it as the reason of their conduct, in partaking of the sacrifices, even in the temples of the idols. But, had there been no other reasons why they should refrain from doing this, (Note, 10: 18—22.) regard to their weaker brethren should have sufficed. For, not every professed Christian, no, nor every true believer had "that knowledge;" so that some of them, even to that time, ventured to eat of the idol sacrifices, who retained a superstitious regard to the supposed invisible object of worship. They had an impression upon their minds, through an association of ideas not easily dissolved, that they were joining in idolatrous sacrifice; and thus "their consciences being weak were defiled." (Marg. Ref. r.) Now, for what object, in any measure adequate, did the Corinthians thus lead their brethren into temptation and sin? "Meat," of whatever kind, "did not recommend them to God;" or give them any religious advantages above those who abstained from it, whether out of scruples of conscience, or regard to their brethren. They ought therefore to be far more cautious and circumspect, in using what they considered as their liberty and privilege; and not to act in such a self-confident and imprudent manner as tended to seduce those into sin, who were weak and unconfirmed in the faith. For if a person of this description saw a Christian who had the reputation of superior knowledge, "sit at meat in the idol's temple," he would be led to follow his example; and induced to do that, which either brought on him the guilt of acting against the dictates of his own conscience, by eating while he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; or to commit real idolatry, through an erroneous conscience, thus emboldened to think, that it was not inconsistent with Christianity, to pay some degree of regard to those idols, which they had been used to worship. (Marg. Ref. s.)—The word, translated "emboldened," is literally "edified:" (Marg.) and thus the apostle intimated, that, instead of edifying their weaker brethren, "in their most holy faith," by their example and endeavours: they were confirming them in the superstitious regard, which in some degree they still retained for idols: and even inducing them to join in those idolatrous rites, by which the worshippers had "fellowship with devils." (Marg. Ref. t.) Thus their knowledge, of which they made so ostentatious a display, directly tended to the ruin of "those for whom Christ died:" and, whatever might be the event, through the special grace of God preventing the fatal consequence, yet, by thus giving a wound, mortal in its nature, to a member of Christ's mystical body, they committed a very heinous sin against the Saviour himself; which would not pass without severe rebukes. (Marg. Ref. b, d. Notes, Ps. 51:4. Acts 9:3—6.) On this account, the apostle declared, that rather than thus "cause his weak brother to offend," or thus displease his gracious Lord, he would to the end of his life eat vegetables alone, and "taste flesh no more for ever." (Marg. Ref. e.)—The word rendered "weak" often means sick, or diseased: and some learned men explain these verses, not of a doubting conscience, but of an erroneous conscience; that is, not of one who ate, though he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; but of one who erroneously thought he might lawfully partake of the sacrifices, with some degree of regard to the idol, and in expectation of some advantage to himself or family. (Note, Rom. 14:19—23.) And indeed, considering the inveterate habits of such as had been brought up, and perhaps grown old in idolatry, and likewise the corrupt state of the Corinthian church; it is not unlikely, that some professed Christians retained a hankering after their former usages; especially, as feasting with their neighbours and relations, on these occasions, would in part exempt them from reproach and persecution. The apostle, however, by "a weak brother," seems particularly to mean the man with a doubting conscience; not him with the erroneous one, at least, not exclusively.—The better. (8) Dr. Whitby, after endeavouring to refute the argument, which some drew from these verses, against conformity to the ceremonies of the church of England, because they doubted the lawfulness of so doing, makes the following important remark: 'Nevertheless, this seemeth to press hard on them, who believe that the schism of such weak persons, will finally tend to their ruin, and render them exiles from the flock of Christ: and yet for things indifferent, will, in this dreadful sense, cause their weak brother to offend: ... since this they do, for that "which commends them not to God," which doing they "are not the better, or omitting they are not the worse." (8) For if schism and idolatry be equally damning sins, and equally "cause my brother to offend," and him to perish for whom "Christ died;" we are equally to take heed in both cases, lest our power to do the thing indifferent, become "a stumblingblock to the weak," or the erroneous in their judgment of these things. For let men imagine what other difference they please in the case, while the sad issue or event is in general the same, to wit, the perishing of my brother; and my power to have abstained from that, which through his erroneous conscience gave occasion to it, is the same, I fear the guilt will be the same.' This cannot easily be answered by those who think nonconformity a fatal schism, and yet require things allowedly indifferent as terms of conformity. (Note, Rom. 14:13—18, v. 14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Satan as effectually injures some men's souls, by tempting them to be proud of their intellectual powers, as he does those of others, by alluring them to the grossest sensualities. That knowledge, therefore, which puffeth up the possessor, and renders him self-confident, dogmatical and unteachable, is as dangerous at least as self-righteous pride; even though an exactly evangelical creed be the object of it; and they, who are elated, because they thus know much about the truth, "know nothing yet as they ought to know;" and need to be sent to school to learn the first rudiments of heavenly wisdom. (Notes, 1 Chr. 28:9. John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 3: 27,18. 4:5,6. 1 John 2:3—6. 5:20,21.) For without holy affections and divine love, all human knowledge is worthless, and far beneath the attainments of apostate angels: but sanctifying affections, and humble grateful love, are not only evidences of the Lord's merciful acceptance, but are important steps to a 'good understanding in the way of godliness.' The proud speculator is probably at the top of his attainments; but the loving disciple, though comparatively ignorant, shall daily be edified and make progress in heavenly wisdom; so that he shall be abundantly enriched from the fulness of Christ.—While we steadily refuse all kinds and degrees of worship to the many, "who are called gods and lords," and to those saints and angels which antichristianity hath devised for mediators; remembering, that "to us there is one God, even the Father, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things;" let us diligently examine whether we really come to God, by faith in the divine Saviour; and whether we be indeed spiritual worshippers of the living and true God, according to his holy word. (Notes, John 4:21—24. Eph. 2:14—18. Heb. 7:23—25. 10:19—22.)

V. 7—13. If our evidence of conversion is clear and decisive, and our views distinct and satisfactory, let us bless God for the consolation: but let us not suppose that this measure of knowledge and assurance is vouchsafed to all believers; or that we are "better" in ourselves, or more beloved of God, than our weaker brethren, the younger children of the same family. Let us beware of self-preference on any pretence, and vainglory and self-indulgence, and of despising those who are disquieted by needless scruples; who, though less comfortable, may perhaps serve God more conscientiously and humbly than we do. (Notes, Rom. 14:2—12.)—Such Christians, as "have knowledge," should also beware of abusing their liberty, and of approaching to the verge, or "appearance of evil;" lest by any means "this liberty of theirs" should prove "an occasion of stumbling others," and so of guilt to themselves. For, should a weak believer see one, who is reputed to have knowledge, sitting at some of those feasts, or in some of those places of public concourse, for which many plead; (about as plausibly as the Corinthians did in behalf of eating in the idol's temple;) might he not be tempted to do the same, though contrary to the convictions of his own conscience? And thus through this man's proud knowledge, and carnal self-indulgence, would the soul of a weak believer "for whom Christ died," be endangered, and his conscience wounded: nay, many who were hopefully inquiring after salvation, may be and doubtless are turned aside and utterly perish. How can men thus "sin against their brethren," and violate the law of love, without deeply offending Christ and endangering their own souls also? What evidence can they have of being true Christians, seeing they act in a manner which is directly contrary to the spirit of the apostle, who would "have eaten no flesh to the end of life, rather than cause his weak brother to offend;" and to the mind of him, who shed his precious blood, and poured out his dying prayers, for his misguided murderers? (P. O. Rom. 14:13—23.)

CHAPTER IX.

St. Paul asserts and proves his apostolical authority, 1—3: and shows that the ministers of the gospel have a right to marry; and, with their families, to be supported by the people, 4—14: yet, he had not availed himself of this right; and had in many things waved the exercise of his liberty, in order to promote the salvation of souls, 15—23. Alluding to the conduct of the contenders in the public games, he proposes to them the example of his own exceeding earnestness in securing the incorruptible crown, 24—27.

AM [a]I not an apostle? [b]am I not free? [c]have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? [d]are not ye my work in the Lord?

2 If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: [e]for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord.

3 Mine [f]answer to [g]them that do examine me is this.

4 Have [h]we not power to eat and to drink?

5 Have we not power [i]to lead about [k]a sister, a [*]wife, as well as other apostles, and as [l]the brethren of the Lord, [m]and Cephas?

6 Or I only and [n]Barnabas, [o]have not we power to forbear working?

7 Who [p]goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges? who [q]planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? [r]or who feedeth a flock, and [s]eateth not of the milk of the flock?

8 Say I these things [t]as a man? [u]or saith not the law the same also?

9 For it is written in the law of Moses, [x]Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. [y]Doth God take care for oxen?

10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? [z]For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: [a]that he that plougheth should plough in hope, and that he that thrasheth in hope should be partaker of his hope.

11 If we have [b]sown unto you spiritual things, is it [c]a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?

12 If [d]others be partakers of this power over you, [e]are not we rather? [f]nevertheless we have not used this power; [g]but suffer all things, lest we should [h]hinder the gospel of Christ.

that the apostle here began a new subject; and entered upon a formal vindication of his conduct among the Corinthians: but he appears rather to have digressed a little from his main subject, in order to illustrate it by his own example, and in different ways; and accordingly he resumed and concluded it in the next chapter. (Notes, 8:7—13. 10:15—33.)—He had before declared his readiness to deny himself "the eating of flesh for ever," rather than "stumble his weak brother;" and he here proceeded to show what he had actually done in this respect, to promote the gospel. But in order to state this clearly, it was necessary to prove his apostolical office, and that he had a right to a maintenance and other privileges in that character. He therefore inquired, "Am I not an Apostle? Am I not free?" i. e. as well as the Corinthians, if he chose to exercise his liberty. Indeed he was aware, that some of them would question his apostleship: but could they deny, that he had seen the Lord Jesus, who repeatedly appeared to him, that he might be an unexceptionable witness of his resurrection and glory? (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 15:3—11. Acts 9:3—7,17—22. 22:14—21.) And were not the Christians at Corinth "his work in the Lord;" who, by employing his ministry for their conversion, had affixed his own seal to Paul's apostolical commission? For he certainly would not thus have attested a direct imposture. So that they were the last persons who ought to have made a doubt of this; being themselves the seal and demonstration of it. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, John 6:22—27. 2 Cor. 3:1—3.) This therefore might serve as a brief but sufficient answer to those, who examined him concerning the credentials of his commission.—Mine answer, &c. (3) 'Namely, what is said in the preceding verse: therefore this is improperly by some joined to the next verse.... He adds this by the way, as if he had said, So far should you be from doubting of my apostleship; that I am used to answer those, who call that in question, by declaring what the Lord hath by me done among you.' Beza.

V. 4, 5. It being determined, that Paul was the apostle of Christ; (Note, 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) he next inquired, whether he had not an indisputable right to eat and drink at their expense; and whether he had not the liberty of marrying a believing woman, and of taking her along with him in his travels; receiving from the churches a maintenance for her and his family also. This several of the apostles did; especially Peter, 'the apostle of the circumcision,' who was attended by his wife, when he went to different places to preach the gospel.—The words "a sister, a wife," are so determinate, that they leave no doubt that several of the apostles were married, and took their wives with them to those places, where they more statedly resided. To render them "a sister, a woman," as some do, would form an unmeaning tautology, or rather one calculated to mislead the reader: for, "a sister" must be a woman: and the latter word would be wholly redundant, if it were not intended to show in what relation she was supposed to stand; namely, that of "a wife," according to the general acceptation of the word.—(Marg. and Marg. Ref.) 'This declares in effect, that St. Peter continued to live with his wife after he became an apostle; and also that St. Peter had no rights as an apostle, which were not common to St. Paul. A remark utterly subversive of popery, if traced to its obvious consequences.' Doddridge.—Clemens of Alexandria not only saith, that he that marrieth hath the apostles as examples, and that St. Peter carried his wife with him till his martyrdom: but confutes the enemies of matrimony from these words.... Adding that they carried about their wives, not as wives, but as sisters, to minister to those who were mistresses of families, that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without any apprehension, or evil suspicions, enter into the apartments of the women.' Whitby. The former part of this quotation shows what the records or traditions of the church in the second century were; the latter is a proof how soon antichristian notions about marriage began to prevail.

Power.] Εξουσια. 5,6,12,18. See on 8:9.

V. 6. The apostle further inquired, whether he "and Barnabas" alone were excluded from the right of being supported without earning their bread by labour. These two eminently useful servants of Christ were called to the apostolical office, after the ascension of Christ; and went forth together "to preach among the Gentiles." (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Acts 13: 14:) The circumstances in which they found themselves, probably, led them to adopt the method of subsisting by their own manual labour, in order to promote the gospel; and they both persevered in it after they separated. (Note, Acts 15:36—41.) But the other apostles, beginning their ministry among the Jews, who had been used to support their teachers, were generally maintained by them without working; and were supplied when they journeyed to other places, where churches had not been planted. Thus Paul and Barnabas, by not requiring a support, seemed to have lost their right to one: and were generally left to labour, and struggle with difficulties and necessities, for want of adequate assistance.—This view of these verses renders their connexion with the foregoing chapter very clear. The apostle was preparing to show the Corinthians, how he waved the exercise of his liberty, in order to do good; that they might see, as in a glass, the impropriety of their selfish exercise of their liberty, "in eating the things offered unto idols." (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, 13 18. 8: 7—13. Acts 18:1—6. 20:32—35. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. 12:11 -15.)

V. 7—12. Had the Corinthians objected, as some suppose, that St. Paul, by not receiving a maintenance, seemed to allow that he was not an apostle; it would have been needless for him formally to prove himself entitled to it: but this was absolutely necessary, if he meant tacitly to instruct them by his example, to give up the self-indulgent exercise of their Christian liberty, or privilege, from love to their brethren. (Notes, 1—3. 8:7—13.) He first shows, that he, as well as other ministers of the gospel, had an equitable claim to a maintenance on the principles of natural justice: for who expected others to employ their time, strength, and skill in their service, without affording them a support? The soldier, when fighting for his country, being thus prevented from attending to his private concerns, had his charges borne by the state. The person, employed in planting a vineyard, was allowed a maintenance from its produce: and he who tended a flock used to eat the milk of the flock. (Marg. Ref p—r.) Who then could think it equitable, to refuse the ministers of religion, while "fighting the good fight of faith," labouring in the Lord's vineyard and husbandry, and feeding his purchased flock, this recompense for their labour? (Notes, 3:4—9. Matt. 9:36—38. John 4:35—38. 21:15—17. Acts 2:28. 2 Cor. 10:1—6. 2 Tim. 2:3—7. 4:6—8. 1 Pet. 5: 1—4.) Ought not those who gave up other prospects of supporting themselves and their families, that they might, with great peril and hardship, promote the spiritual good of others, to be maintained in a decent and comfortable manner by them?—'Chrysostom and Theophylact observe, that he saith not, Who goeth to warfare, and is not rich? Who plants a vineyard, and heaps not up gold of the fruits of it? Who feeds a flock, and makes not a merchandise of the sheep? Teaching us, that the spiritual pastor should be content with little, and seek only what is necessary, not what is superfluous.' Whithy.—But was this merely the dictate of human reason? Verily the law gave an emblematical intimation of it, when it forbad the Israelites to muzzle the ox, which was employed in treading out the grain. (Deut. 25:4.)—If the ox must not be refused a share of that abundance, which men enjoyed through its labour; surely the laborious and patient minister should be supported by those, who received far richer blessings by his diligent and self-denying services. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Notes, Hos. 10:9—11. 1 Tim. 5:17,18.) For could it be supposed, that God made such particular laws from a regard to oxen? He indeed required men to be merciful to the beasts, and his providential care and bounty extended to all creatures: yet doubtless this prohibition was entirely given for the sake of the human species; that none should receive his neighbour's service without wages: and especially for the sake of ministers, that they should be supported in a suitable manner, as a recompense for their useful and affectionate labours. Thus, when endeavouring to propagate the gospel among the Gentiles, or when labouring, amidst great hardship and necessities, among unconverted persons, where no support could be expected, any more than the oxen had when ploughing the ground; they might be encouraged, by the hope of future maintenance, to persevere in the work: and, when employed in furthering the joy and growth of believers, they might be partakers of the expected recompense, and have some refreshment and relief after their hardships, by a comfortable maintenance; as the oxen eat of the corn, when treading it out for the benefit of others. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) And indeed, if the ministers of Christ had sown the "spiritual" seed of the word of God, which was about to produce, for the benefit of the people, the excellent and permanent fruits of salvation; ought they to deem it great matter, a large expense to themselves, or a great favour to their ministers, if they allowed them to reap a portion of "their carnal things;" which were of an earthly nature, and could not long be preserved, and which would prove them also "carnal," if they either tenaciously hoarded them, or luxuriously spent them on themselves? (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, Mal. 3:7—12. Rom. 15:22—29. Gal. 6:6—10.) If then other pastors, and even the false teachers at Corinth, had been allowed to partake of this privilege, or authority over them, much more was this due to the apostle and his helpers, who first preached the gospel among them. Nevertheless, they had not availed themselves of this undoubted right; but had chosen to endure unceasing labour, pinching want, and every extremity, "lest they should give any hinderance to the gospel of Christ," and prevent its success. Yet after all, the Corinthians would not abridge themselves of the indulgence of a luxurious meal, out of love to their weaker brethren! This is evidently the contrast intended; and a most striking contrast it was. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, 2 Kings 5:15,16,20—25.)—Thou shalt not muzzle, &c. (9) Exactly from LXX.

V. 13—18. The apostle here adduced another proof of his right to a maintenance. The Christians at Corinth could not but know, that the priests and Levites, who attended on the worship of the temple, (and so spent their time in that service as to be excluded from the inheritances and the employments with which the other Israelites supported themselves and their families,) were maintained from the tithes, first-fruits, oblations, and sacrifices there presented: (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Num. 18:20:21. 35:2—8.) in like manner, the Lord Jesus had appointed, that the ministers of his gospel should be supported by the people, for their services in this sacred function, and not be obliged to engage in any other. (Note, Matt. 10:9,10.) Some expositors argue, from the apostle's frequent reference to the law, that the judaizing teachers were his chief opponents at Corinth. Yet the contrary is evident; and doubtless all professed Christians would soon become acquainted with the holy Scriptures, and might properly be referred to them. Indeed the Old Testament is replete in every part with instructions to us at this day, though no one thinks of obeying the ceremonial law.—The Corinthians, however, well knew, that the apostle had not insisted on his right, in any of these things; nor did he thus write to them, in order to induce them to raise him an income: on the contrary, he deemed himself to have such a ground of glorying, (though not before God, yet before them,) in this self-denying, disinterested conduct, that he should account it more desirable to die even by want, or in any way, than by receiving support from them, to "render it void." Probably, he had witnessed some things in the disposition of the Corinthian Christians, which first induced him to decline receiving any support from them. What had passed since he left them still more confirmed him in his purpose: he thought himself unkindly used by them, and in this way only would he show them his sense of their misconduct. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 12:11—21.) He knew that the false teachers wanted an occasion against him; but this disinterestedness gave him an advantage over them: and it was very important that his example should be contrasted with their conduct, which could not otherwise so properly have been done. Indeed, he had "nothing to glory in," (though he had faithfully preached the gospel,) as peculiarly expressive of his zeal and love, and which he might oppose to the vainglorious boasts of false teachers. For he had been called to this ministry in so singular a manner, that "a necessity was laid upon him," and he could not decline the service, or execute it unfaithfully, without incurring the heaviest condemnation. If indeed he had, without an express command, (having previously embraced the gospel,) deliberately and willingly engaged in the work of the ministry, from love to Christ and to the souls of sinners, and zeal for the glory of God; he might have been assured of a gracious and abundant recompense. But, as he was so wonderfully arrested, when violently persecuting the church, and intrusted with a dispensation, or stewardship, without any previous choice or willingness; a line of conduct of a peculiar nature was requisite for him, in order to show that he was not actuated by slavish fear, or mercenary principles. (Notes, Acts 9:1—22.) For, if this had been the case, where would have been his reward? (Marg. Ref. o—x. Notes, Matt. 6:1—5,16—18.) Or how could he, in his peculiar circumstances, distinguish himself from mercenary teachers, and thus have ground of glorying, through the grace of God, in this distinction? Or how might he possess the assurance of a gracious reward? Truly, by preaching the gospel freely, without putting his hearers to any expense: and by enduring poverty, hunger, and labour, rather than make an inexpedient and improper use of his liberty and privilege, as an apostle of Christ. Thus he evidenced that he acted from the genuine principles of zeal and love, and so enjoyed much comfort and assurance of hope in his own soul.—Let it here be carefully noted, that for ministers of religion to insist on their due, and use their liberty, when this hinders their usefulness, is to "abuse their power in the gospel." free" from every obligation to comply with other men's inclinations, or to conform to their customs; yet he had voluntarily become as "a slave to all men," or to men of every nation, rank, or religious opinion: by renouncing all personal considerations, and bearing with their prejudices, mistakes, and infirmities, as far as he could consistently with his duty; in order that he might win over the more to the faith of Christ. (Marg. Ref. z—b. Note, Prov. 11:30.) So that he conversed among the unconverted Jews, as though he had considered the Mosaic law to be still in force: thus he circumcised Timothy, that he might give them no offence; (Note, Acts 16:1—3.) and he paid that regard to their rules, which consisted with his duty as the apostle of the Gentiles, without regarding the trouble and self-denial of so doing. By this conduct he endeavoured to win upon them, to attend to his doctrine for their good. Even to the Jewish converts, who still deemed themselves under the authority of the ritual law, he became as one of them; and joined with them in their worship and purifications, as far as he could without misleading them; in order that he might soften their prejudices and be made useful to them. He likewise conversed as freely among the Gentiles, as if he had been unacquainted with the law of Moses, in order that he might win them over to embrace the gospel. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, Acts 21:22—26. Gal. 2:11—16. 4:12—16.) He did not however disregard the authority and commands of God, but considered himself to be "under the law to Christ," bound to receive the moral law from his hand as a rule of duty; taught by his grace to love it and delight in it; and, as delivered from its curse, engaged by additional motives to yield a prompt obedience to it. (Marg. Ref. f.)—In like manner, he condescended to the infirmities and scruples of "the weak" in faith, as if he too had been weak; abridging himself of his liberty, lest he should grieve or ensnare them; without making any ostentation of stronger faith or greater knowledge, or showing any neglect or contempt of them. (Notes, 8:7—13. 10:29—33. Rom. 15:1—3.) Thus, in every respect, in which he could do it with a good conscience, "he became all things to all men," by an habitual, cheerful, patient endurance of their infirmities, and toleration of their prejudices and mistakes in things unessential; that, by every means which he could devise, "he might save some," from each of the several descriptions of men among whom he laboured. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Note, 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) This he did from love to the gospel, and a valuation of its blessings; that he might be a partaker of them himself, and might also share them with numerous converts, and especially with the Corinthians; not being satisfied, as it were, to be saved himself, without he could prevail for the salvation of others also. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Note, John 12:23—26.)—Nothing could be more suited to shame those whom he addressed out of a selfish use of their liberty, than this statement of his own principles and conduct; or more strongly mark the surprising change which had taken place in him, since the time, when, by cruel persecution, he aimed to make all the Christians every where conform to his own sentiments and practice, in the great concerns of religion.

V. 24—27. To illustrate his subject, the apostle called the attention of the people to the Isthmian games, which were celebrated near Corinth. Did they not well know, that though several racers set out to run for the prize, yet it was awarded to the victorious person alone, and the rest were disappointed, and in a measure disgraced? This induced each of them to exert himself to the utmost, in order to be successful. Let then the Corinthians do the same in their Christian course let them run with earnestness, self-denial, and patience, without shrinking from hardships or perils, and without loitering from attention to worldly allurements; that they might obtain the prize, which self-indulgent professors of Christianity would come short of. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, Phil. 3:12—14. Heb. 12:1.) They well knew, that every man, who contended in those athletic exercises, must prepare himself for them by rule, in respect of his diet, and all other things. This would, in many cases, require peculiar temperance, self-government, and self-denial, without which no one could expect to succeed. Now, they submitted to this for a garland of herbs, or evergreens, which would soon wither and decay, even as the honour annexed to them must be very transient: but Christians contended with the enemies of their salvation, in hopes of obtaining an "incorruptible crown of glory and felicity;" and surely they ought not to shrink from any self-denial or suffering, (Marg. Ref. p—r. Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) The apostle, as to himself, could truly say, that he did not so run in this race as to leave the event of it "uncertain," or as willing to be left among the undistinguished multitude of losers. Nor did he fight, as the pugilists used to exercise themselves, when their blows only beat the air, having no opponent to contend with; but as they did when actually engaged in the combat. Thus he got the better of his animal inclinations; as they used to subdue their antagonists, when by violent blows they beat them down to the ground, and kept them under till they yielded the victory. For he not only refused his appetites unlawful or inexpedient indulgences; but he habituated them to brook denial in every thing, when there was a call to it: and he inured his body to hard labour and patient sufferings; and thus wore it out, of which the marks and scars might be visible to every one. In this way he sought and possessed the assurance, that he should not, after having preached to others, (like the heralds who called the combatants to the conflict,) be himself rejected, as having no title to the incorruptible crown. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 2 Tim. 4:6—8.)—This did not imply that the apostle doubted of his acceptance, or perseverance: but it showed the Corinthians the nature of his assurance, and forcibly cautioned them not to rest in such hopes, as were consistent with indiscriminate self-indulgence, even in things lawful. He had abundant occasions and methods of thus "keeping under his body, and bringing it into subjection," without using the tortures, austerities, and flagellations of the papists: while he willingly endured hunger, thirst, fatigue, and imprisonment, in preaching the gospel; and was frequently "in watchings, fastings," and prayers, as well as habitually temperate in all things. (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:3—10 11:21—27.)—The apostle seems designedly to contrast the continence and temperance of the heathen combatants, for a fading crown, with the luxurious self-indulgence of the Corinthian Christians, whom no motives, either taken from the good of their brethren, their own spiritual advantage, or the honour of the gospel, could induce to deny themselves the gratification of a sensual feast.—"The body" seems here to be meant literally.—The depraved nature, "the body of sin and death," must be crucified as a malefactor: (Notes, Rom. 6:5—7. 7:22—25. 8:12,13. Gal. 5:22—26.) but "the body" or animal frame, the exquisite workmanship of the great Creator needs only by wholesome and sometimes sharp discipline to be brought under, and kept under, as a well-educated child. The unsuccessful racers or pugilists in the public games at most were only exposed to some transient disgrace, while their other comforts remained to them: but in the Christian conflict, there is no alternative between the incorruptible crown, and everlasting shame and misery.

CHAPTER X.

When Israel came out of Egypt, they all shared in those things, which were sacramental signs of spiritual blessings; yet most of them died in the wilderness, 1—5. Their example is recorded as a warning to professed Christians, not to imitate their crimes, 6—12. God will not suffer his servants to be tempted, so as to have no way of escape, 13. They must flee from idolatry, 14. They cannot have fellowship with Christ and believers, in the Lord's supper; and with idolaters, in those sacrifices which are offered to devils, 15—22. In the use of things lawful, the good of others should be consulted, 23—30; that all may be done to the glory of God, and without giving any occasion of falling to men, 31—33.

MOREOVER, brethren, [a]I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all [b]our fathers [c]were under the cloud, [d]and all passed through the sea;

2 And were all [e]baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea;

3 And [f]did all eat the same spiritual meat;

4 And [g]did all drink the same spiritual drink: (for they drank of that spiritual Rock that [h]followed them; and [h]that Rock was Christ.)

5 But [i]with many of them God was not well pleased; for they were overthrown in the wilderness.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. When the Lord hears the prayers of his ministers, and blesses their labours in the conversion of sinners, he sets his seal to their commission. This should satisfy conscientious ministers in respect of their own call to the work, and be deemed a sufficient proof to others, especially to those converted by them: though no occasional usefulness will prove an unholy man to be a real Christian, or a self-confident boaster to be a "faithful steward of the mysteries of God."—However expedient the single life may be in some cases; yet marriage not only consists with the office of a stated pastor, but with that of a missionary, or an evangelist, as it did with that of the holy apostles, and is often highly expedient for them: and though ministers may see good in some circumstances, to labour for their bread, they have an undoubted right to a decent maintenance for themselves and families; whether natural equity, or the word of God, be appealed to. They who judge it best "not to use this power," are the most proper persons to enforce the equity of it: as they may do it with less suspicion of wrong motives; and, as otherwise their conduct might be misconstrued to the disadvantage of their brethren. Nor ought they, who reap the spiritual benefit of the minister's labours, to yield a proportion of their temporal goods, as if it were an alms, or a great favour conferred on him; for it is at least as much his due, as the soldier's or the labourer's wages. How should it be expected that men will give up the prospect of lucrative employments, and creditable professions, to engage in this warfare, to "labour in the Lord's husbandry," or "to feed his flock;" if they cannot do it in hope of living by their profession? How can they face the dangers and endure the hardships of ploughing up the fallow ground, by preaching to the ignorant, careless, and profligate; if pinching want be their only prospect, however diligent and successful they may be? Or how can they minister to the comfort and edification of believers; when they are burdened with debts, destitute of necessaries, surrounded by indigent families, compelled to place their children in unsuitable situations, or driven themselves into other employments for bread? How can they but suspect that their hearers are deceiving themselves, in professing to love Christ and the gospel; while they enjoy plenty, and lay up for their children, yet leave their pastors to wear out their lives in distressing poverty?—Ministers have passions and feelings like other men; they find as much inward and outward opposition, to the exercise of faith, and hope, and patience, as their brethren, and commonly more: so that their spirits are often depressed, and their hands weakened on these accounts; when a regard to the real dignity of their office forbids them to complain, and induces them to suffer in silence and submission.—On the other hand, it behooves ministers to be as disinterested as possible: they had better "suffer all things," and even lose their lives, than give reason to suspect that they act from love to "filthy lucre;" or that any should make "their glorying void," when they avow that the love of Christ, and of souls, dictates their affectionate persuasions and solemn warnings. But if they, to whom "a dispensation is given to preach the gospel," and who act according to it, have no ground of glorying; because "necessity is laid upon them, and wo is to them if they do not:" what will be the case of those, who willingly assume this office, and seek a designation to it; and then bestow no pains to preach the gospel, or to preach at all; but only aim to appropriate to themselves, and to secure to their children, relatives, or dependents, as much as possible of those funds, which were established for the maintenance of such as "labour in the word and doctrine?" Wo! wo! to such "idol-shepherds," to such hireling priests; yea, to all who encourage and reward their unfaithfulness! (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Zech. 11:15—17. Mal. 1:9—11.)—But in proportion as we honestly lay ourselves out in this good work, and willingly embrace opportunities of "preaching the gospel without charge," whenever they offer themselves; and give up our right lest we "should abuse our power in the gospel;" we may be assured, that we act upon genuine principles, and shall have a gracious reward: for "when the chief Shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." (Note, 1 Pet. 5:1—4. P. O. 1—7.)

V. 19—27. While we refuse to flatter the person or palliate the vices of any man, or to deviate from truth and duty, to gain favour or applause: we should be ready to give up our own interest, humour, credit, or inclinations, and to be "servants to all men," that "we may gain the more." (P. O. Rom. 15:1—7.) A mind freed from narrow bigotry, enlarged by comprehensive views of the grand object of the gospel, and taught to keep the great end of doing good continually in view, will know when to wave minute discussions, to connive at less dangerous prejudices; and to venture down towards the ground of other men, in order to argue with them upon their own principles, and to bring them to saving views of the gospel. But while a man postpones, or subordinates, every other thing to this grand object, as far as consists with important truth and duty: while he "becomes all things to all men, that he may gain the more," to share with him in the great blessings of salvation, and to be useful to persons of different sentiments and descriptions; and while, on the other hand, he will not give place for a moment, where essential truth or the salvation of souls are at stake; he must expect to be deemed a timeserver by bigots; inconsistent by the ignorant; a bigot by the unprincipled; and unsound, weak, or unfaithful by the self-conceited. (Note, 2:14—16.) Indeed, we should always watch against extremes. If we have to do with those who are superstitious, or self-righteous; while we insist on the necessity of good works, and connive at their mere external forms; we must be very careful to warn them against relying on their own performances, and decided in leading them to trust in Christ alone. If we have to do with those, who seem to be "without law," and would endeavour to show them, that true religion requires of us no injurious or useless observances; we must still remember, that we are "not without law to God, but under the law to Christ;" and we must not countenance or connive at their loose principles or practices: and, in condescending to the weak and injudicious, we must not tolerate those errors or faults, which may either injure them, or disgrace the gospel. But a simple heart, a single eye, and an habitual reliance on God for heavenly wisdom, will carry a man through such services and past such dangers, as cannot be directed or guarded against by any rules.—If, however, we would be regarded as men earnestly and zealously seeking the salvation of others, we must not be remiss in securing our own. We must run the race vigorously, if we would have them so to "run that they may obtain." We must endeavour to practise our own exhortations: in "striving for the mastery, we must be temperate in all things;" and "in fighting the good fight" we must contend, as those who know they are opposed by real and formidable enemies. Thus subduing our sinful passions, habituating every inclination to submit, "keeping our bodies under, and bringing them into subjection," we shall best enjoy the assurance, that when we have "preached to others we shall not ourselves be castaways;" for this, though tremendous in the extreme, it is to be feared, is not at all uncommon. And when we consider what labour, self-denial, self-abasement, and perseverance, men submit to, for the fading honours and distinctions and corruptible interests of this world, o which contested elections in this land give us a striking illustration; it should make us ashamed of shrinking from any hardship, abstinence, self-abasement, or suffering, which may be needful, in securing "the incorruptible crown" and most blessed inheritances for which we are called to contend. Finally, in those ancient contests, and in those of our own days above alluded to, men may without danger or mischief decline the contest: but that "good fight of faith" to which we are called, cannot be declined without incurring the dire penalty of everlasting destruction. We must engage, and we must conquer, or perish among the enemies of God.

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1—5. (Notes, 8: 12:1—3.) In prosecuting his subject concerning "things offered to idols," the apostle next referred to the case of Israel, and the judgments of God, which came upon them for their lustings, murmurings, and self-indulgence. He would not have the Christians at Corinth ignorant, how that all the fathers of the nation of Israel came out of Egypt under the guidance

6 Now [k]these things were our [*]examples, to the intent we should not [l]lust after evil things, as they also lusted.

7 Neither [m]be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is written, [n]The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play.

8 Neither [o]let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand.

9 Neither let us [p]tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, [q]and were destroyed of serpents.

10 Neither [r]murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and [s]were destroyed of the [t]destroyer.

11 Now all these things happened unto them for [t]ensamples: [x]and they are written for our admonition, [y]upon whom the ends of the world are come.

12 Wherefore, [z]let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

and protection of "the cloud," which gave them light by night and was an overshadowing canopy to them by day; being an emblem of the Lord's providential care and gracious guidance of his people; (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, Ex. 13: 21,22. 14:19,20,24,25. 40:36—38.) and that the whole company was safely conducted through the Red Sea, in which the Egyptians were drowned. Thus they were initiated, as by baptism, into the true religion, under the instruction of Moses, the type of Christ; by the overshadowing cloud, and by the waters of the sea: and the whole nation, men, women, and children, were acknowledged as the visible church of God; in a manner which resembled that by which all professed Christians were admitted into the church by baptism. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Ex. 14:15. Matt. 28:19,20.) They all, likewise, without exception, were sustained by the manna: and this miraculous provision might be called "spiritual meat;" as it typified Christ, "the Bread of life" to the souls of the true Israel. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Ex. 16:4,5,31—36. Ps. 78:17—31. John 6:30—35,41—58.) And they all drank of those waters, which flowed from the rock and followed them as a river, through most of their wanderings in the wilderness. This too might be called "spiritual drink," for it typified the sacred influences of the Holy Spirit, as given to believers through Jesus Christ: and the rock itself might be called "spiritual;" for "that Rock was Christ," a type of him, who was wounded and smitten for our sins, that salvation might be communicated to our perishing souls. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Ex. 17:5,6, P. O. 1—7. Num. 20:2—5,10—13. Ps. 78:13—16.)—Nothing can more clearly show the absurdity of forcing figurative language into a literal meaning, and so grounding doctrines upon it, as the Papists have done in the monstrous notion of transubstantiation, than this text does. By such a mode of construction we might prove that the rock was literally the person of Christ; and that "the rock" followed the Israelites in the wilderness! (Notes, Matt. 26:26—28. Luke 22:19,20.) The Israelites, in respect of these things, seemed all alike the people of God, and dear to him: yet was he "not well pleased with the most of them;" (Note, Num. 16:1—4.) so that they were destroyed in the wilderness in such multitudes, that their dead bodies lay in heaps upon the ground, as after the carnage of some terrible battle. V. 6—10. The apostle, in applying his subject, next observed, that these events were intended to be instructive examples to the Christian church, or figurative representations of God's dealings with his professed worshippers, in all ages: that by the fatal consequences of Israel's disobedience and rebellion, others might be deterred from allowing an evil concupiscence after sinful or inexpedient indulgences. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, 9:24—27. Num. 11:4—9,31—34. Ps. 78:17—31. 106:15.) The apostle, therefore, warned the Corinthians to "flee from idolatry," of which they were in great danger; because they loved the luxurious gratification of their appetites, and the pleasures of a feast, whatever other reasons they assigned for their conduct. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Ex. 32:1—6. Ps. 106:19—23.) Some expositors suppose that the word, rendered "to play," signifies to commit fornication: but the Israelites are not, on that occasion, charged with this crime, or any other of the same nature: and a jovial festive religion, without gross and scandalous immorality, is peculiarly congenial to human nature, as circumstanced in this world. (P. O. Ex. 32:1—14.) For regard to character and worldly interest, and some remaining feeling in the conscience, restrain very large numbers of unconverted persons from direct licentiousness; especially where the word of God is so far known, as to render those crimes shameful, and uneasy to the conscience, which the Gentiles practised without shame or remorse.—In the next verse the apostle directly warns the Corinthians against fornication: to which the inhabitants of Corinth were so addicted, that one Greek word, signifying 'to commit fornication,' is taken from the name of that city; (Χορινθιαζειν, to follow the custom of Corinth;) and he adduces the example of Israel, when, by the counsel of Balaam, the daughters of Moab were their tempters, and their fornication was connected with the worship of Baal-peor.—Twenty-three thousand died of the plague, besides one thousand slain by the sword at the command of Moses. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Num. 25:)—He then cautions them against "tempting Christ," by provoking him to jealousy, wearing out his patience, and putting his love and power to the proof, as the Israelites had done in the wilderness, when he was with them as JEHOVAH of Hosts, their Redeemer: (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Num. 21:4—9.) and from murmuring ungratefully at the Lord's dispensations towards them, the restrictions laid on them, or the spiritual authority exercised over them, as the Israelites had done; and for which they had been cut off by desolating judgments, and the destroying angel, whom the Lord employed against them. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, Num. 13: 14: 16: 17: 20:) These transactions have before been fully considered; and the application of them to the conduct of the Corinthians must be obvious to every attentive reader.—The people sat down, &c. V. 11, 12. The apostle further observed, that those things, which seemed so severe in respect of Israel, were merciful in the object; being intended as "examples" to others, warning them to restrain their appetites and passions, and to exercise holy caution and humble fear. (Note, 6—10.) Especially they "were written for the admonition" of Christians, "on whom the completion of the ages was come:" who had the substance of the ancient shadows, and the accomplishment of all the prophecies; who enjoyed those advantages, which were the end and perfection of the old dispensation; and who lived under the light of the last and most complete revelation, which was to be vouchsafed to the world. under the darker dispensation of the law, and would be punished with more terrible judgments. It therefore was proper, that every man, who supposed himself to stand secure in the favour of God, and strong in the faith of the gospel, without being troubled by weak and superstitious scruples, should "take heed that he did not fall" away from his self-confident profession, and at last lie under the righteous condemnation of God, having only "the form of godliness:" or lest he should (like Peter, when through self-confidence he neglected to watch and pray,) fall into grevious sin, and thus wound his conscience, expose himself to severe rebukes, disgrace his profession, and injure or ruin the souls of others. V. 13. The Corinthians would be the more inexcusable, should they, through self-confidence and unwatchfulness, fall into sin: because "no temptation had befallen them," but such as men in general must meet with, from their own hearts, the suggestions of Satan, and the allurements of the world. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, Jam. 1:13—15.)—For they had not been tempted, by severe persecutions, to deny Christ, or conform to the established idolatry, as many had been and would be. The apostle, however, did not mean to discourage the humble and fearful, by thus mentioning far sharper trials than those which they had met with: for, if indeed they truly believed, the faithfulness of God to his promise and covenant would secure them from being finally overcome by any temptation. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 1:4—9. 1 Thes. 5:23—28. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) He would so direct and overrule every event, and so restrain the malice of tempters and persecutors, as well as communicate strength proportioned to their trials; that they should never be "tempted above what they were able:" but in one way or other, he would in his providence or by his grace, make a way for them to escape, that they should be enabled to bear the trial, and come forth out of it unhurt, however sharp or durable it might be. This cannot mean, that all believers should be rendered victorious over every particular temptation: because in that case they must all be kept from actual sin, which is contrary to fact and Scripture: yet it must imply, that no concurrence of circumstances should ever cast them into such temptation, as would render the commission of sin absolutely unavoidable; and that nothing should ever occasion their final apostacy and condemnation. (Notes, John 10:26—31. Rom. 8:32—39.)—The word rendered, "a way to escape," is suited to lead the reader's thoughts to the case of a poor shipwrecked mariner, who has indeed escaped to dry land; but the winds roar, the billows rage, the tide flows, the cliffs overhang; and death, inevitable death, seems still to pursue him:—when at length he discovers an opening, or gate, such as are common in some places, where the cliff is high and steep; and thus a most welcome outlet, or "way of escape," is unexpectedly afforded him. The experience of Christians, who have been peculiarly tried and tempted, till ready to give up hope: and yet have at length been rescued, and filled with admiring gratitude, will show the peculiar propriety of the illustration.

V. 14—17. The examples and warnings which had been given sufficiently proved, that Christians ought to flee to the greatest distance from all approaches to idolatry, and occasions of it: for if so small a temptation as a feast was more than they could resist; how could they hope to withstand in the evil day of fiery persecution? (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 8:7—13. Jer. 12:5,6.) The Christians at Corinth valued themselves on their superior knowledge and wisdom; and the apostle would speak to them "as to wise men," and call on them, impartially and discreetly, to judge of what he had further to say, against their feasting in the idol-temples. (Marg. Ref. g. Note, 4:8.) Would they not allow, that the cup of wine, which was used in the Lord's supper, to represent spiritual blessings, and as an act of praise and thanksgiving to God, after it had been blessed, and set apart by prayer for that purpose, was a token and pledge of their "communion of the blood of Christ," as the atonement for sin, and of their being made joint partakers of it? And was not the bread which they broke, a token of their participating of his body? Did not a man's joining in that sacred institution, imply a profession of faith in Christ crucified, and of adoring gratitude to him for this salvation? Certainly every one would put this construction on it: and if a man really intended in his heart, what he thus professed, he would actually be partaker of the Saviour's blood shed, and body broken, for the sins of the world. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, 11:23—28. Matt. 26:26—28.) For all Christians, by this sacrament, and the faith sincerely professed in it, and the grace implied, were united, as the grains of wheat in one loaf of bread, or as the members in the human body; seeing they were all one with Christ, and had fellowship with him, and with one another, by partaking of the same bread, as a token of their feeding by faith on the same spiritual nourishment for their souls. (Marg. Ref. l, m.)—In like manner, to join with idolaters, in their feasts at the temples of their idols, must be understood as a professed act of communion and participation with the idol and its worshippers: and if this were not intended, it was a sort of hypocritical profession.—'The apostle calls it "the cup of blessing," because when we have it in our hand, we praise and bless, with admiration of his ineffable gift, him who shed his blood for us; and not only shed his blood, but has made us all partakers of it.' Ambrose.—'These words, "the bread which we break," the "loaf, or bread, is one," and we all partake of one loaf, and therefore are one body, show how grossly the church of Rome has varied from Christ's institution, in distributing to the communicants, severally, an unbroken wafer; so that they are neither partakers of one loaf, or bread, or of "bread broken."' Whitby. (Note. 12:12—14.)

V. 18—22. The subject might be illustrated by the case of "Israel after the flesh," the whole nation, and not merely the company of true believers in Israel. (Note, Gal. 6:15,16.) Those who feasted in the courts of the temple, upon the flesh of the sacrifices and peace-offerings, of which part had been burned upon the altar, were understood to have fellowship with JEHOVAH and his worshippers, and expected to partake of the benefits arising from such sacrifices: and was not the meaning similar, when any one feasted with idolaters in the idol-temples, upon the sacrifices? had not he also communion with the idol and its votaries? (Marg. Ref. n, o.) Would any persons then suppose the apostle to mean, that an idol was a real being to whom worship was rendered? or that these sacrifices differed materially from other food? (Marg. Ref. p. Note, 8:4—6.) Thus he knew that some would speculate to excuse their self-indulgence. But, though the deities, to which they sacrificed, were nonentities, and all the account of their origin and exploits were mere fables, or in a great degree fabulous, being distorted histories of deceased eminent men; yet he must inform them, that their sacrifices were actually presented to devils, fallen angels, malignant demons; and that these ambitious rivals of God were gratified by them, in proportion as God was dishonoured and provoked. Perhaps some might suppose, that the name was not essential, and that God was worshipped in these rites, though under another title; (as modern speculators have asserted, that JEHOVAH, or Jupiter, are virtually the same; and that the Supreme Being is worshipped with equal acceptance, 'in every age and every clime;') but the apostle assured them, that these sacrifices were not presented to God, but to the determined enemies of God and man: and he would, on no account, have his beloved fellow-Christians join themselves with demons and their worshippers. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) Indeed, they could not render the ordinances of Christ consistent with these abominable rites: and if they attempted it, they would provoke the Lord to jealousy, by this familiarity with his detested rivals; as if they were "stronger than he," and could defend themselves against his judgments: even as a woman, though not guilty of gross adultery, must excite the suspicion and indignation of her husband, if she associated familiarly with the man of whom he entertained a peculiar jealousy. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Note, Ex. 20:5.)—The apostle joined himself in these inquiries, to show how greatly he abhorred such a conduct, and how he should dread the consequences of being seduced into it. 'Dare you then, being espoused to Christ, provoke the Lord to jealousy by idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom? Then fallen angels, or wicked spirits, must exclusively be intended: and the worship of the idolaters, though not rendered to "the devil," in the exact scriptural meaning of the word, which distinguishes between "the devil, and his angels," (Matt. 25:41.) was rendered to evil spirits, not perhaps by express intention, (though the character and conduct ascribed to the objects of the pagan worship, renders even this doubtful,) yet eventually: evil spirits were substituted in the place of God, and received the glory due to him.—The Scripture knows nothing of demons, in a good sense, whatever heathen writers did, or learned modern divines now do. V. 23—28. (Notes, 6:12—17. 8:7—13.) Feasting in the idol-temples having been proved to be direct idolatry; the apostle next proceeded to show, that some limitations must be assigned to their liberty, and expediency and mutual edification consulted, in the use even of lawful things. He exhorted his brethren at Corinth therefore not to seek their own indulgence or satisfaction, exclusively or principally; but to study the spiritual welfare and advantage of their brethren and neighbours, whom they ought "to love as themselves;" and for whose greater good they ought to give up every inferior interest or gratification. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) They might, however, be allowed to eat without scruple what they bought in the public market; without asking any questions, whether it had been offered to an idol or not: lest they should receive an answer, which might perplex or wound the consciences of their brethren, if their own were out of danger: for, as "the earth and its fulness" belonged to the Lord, they might partake of his bounty without hesitation, provided they knew no reason to the contrary. (Marg. Ref. z—b, g. Note, Ps. 24:1,2.) In like manner, if an unbelieving friend or relation invited any of them to his house, and they were disposed to go; (which in many cases would be "lawful," and in some even "expedient;") let them eat of the provisions set before them without asking any questions. But if one informed them, that this or the other dish was part of an idol-sacrifice, let them refrain from eating of it: because it would be proper thus to protest against idolatry, and to show their judgment of it, for the benefit especially of him who told them, whether he were a Christian or an unbeliever; and that they might not wound the conscience of any man. And, as "the earth and its fulness were the Lord's;" they could not need such defiled food, but might be supplied with other meat, though they abstained from this. (Marg. Ref. c—f.)—Some versions and manuscripts omit the concluding clause: but there appears to me a peculiar beauty in the repetition, and it is entirely in the apostle's manner.—All things are lawful, &c. (23) 'Tertullian, speaking of women's apparel, says, 'How much more easily will she fear things unlawful, who is cautious and scrupulous in things lawful!" The invitation of a relation or friend, who had not embraced the gospel, does not imply the idea of "a feast," but merely a social meeting and meal.—The earth, &c. (26,28.) V. 29—33. The apostle observed, perhaps with reference to the self-confidence of some at Corinth, that he did not so much mean that they ought to abstain for the sake of their own consciences, for he supposed them able to discard all scruples of this kind; but for the sake of other men's consciences, especially those of their weaker brethren. (Note, 8:7—13.) Yet they would inquire, why their liberty was to be thus judged and restrained, out of regard to other men's consciences; or why they were to be blamed and slandered, in eating those things, for which they gave thanks, and which they received in a thankful and believing frame of mind. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Rom. 14:2—6. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Thus we may explain the passage, as the objection of the Corinthians to the apostle's directions: but it may be understood as his inquiry: Why should they so incautiously use their liberty, as to give cruse for its being condemned, in the consciences of other men? Or why should they so use those good gifts of God, which they received with thanksgiving, as to give cause for slander or offence? (Note, Rom. 14:13—18.) He therefore concluded this subject, by admonishing them, "whether they ate or drank," in any place or company, or "whatever they did," to do it all with an habitual aim at the glory of God; by considering his precepts, and the propriety, expediency, appearance, and tendency, of their actions, and the construction which others would put upon them; and by acting with prudence, temperance, thankfulness, consistency, and charity in every thing. (Marg Ref. l. Notes, Luke 11: 41. Col. 3:16,17,22—25.) Thus the whole tenor of their conduct would show the excellency of the gospel, and conduce to win over others to it; by which the name and perfections of God would be the more extensively known, adored, and glorified. This great end they ought habitually to have in view; whatever interfered with it ought to be avoided; and every interest, pursuit, and indulgence, should be rendered subordinate, or even, if possible, subservient to it. They would then be careful not to give needless offence to any man; to throw no stumblingblock in the way, either of Jews or Gentiles; and not to give occasion of sin to the church, or any believer; but to imitate the apostle as he imitated Christ, (Note, 11:1.) and according to what he had shown them of his principles and conduct. (Notes, 9:19—27.) For he had endeavoured to please men of all descriptions, and in all things, as far as consisted with faithfulness; in nothing consulting his own emolument or satisfaction, but "the good of many, in order to their salvation." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. m—o. Note, Rom. 15:1—3.)—Neither to the Jews. (32) 'The Jew will be apt hence to conclude, that Christianity renders you enemies to the law and the prophets; the Gentiles, that your professed abhorrence of idols is not real, and that the practice in which you comply with them is not sinful: and the weak Christian will be tempted by your example, to eat these things "with conscience of the idol," (8:7.) or to fly off from the Christian faith.' Whitby.

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to imitate him, as he imitated Christ, 1. He praises them for observing his injunctions, 2. He gives directions concerning men and women prophesying, 3—16. He blames them for abuses in their religious assemblies; especially for their divisions, 17—19; and their profanation of the Lord's supper, 2 —22; reminding them of the first institution of it; and showing the danger, and the painful effects, arising from the partaking of it unworthily, 23—34.

BE [a]ye followers of me, [b]even as I also am of Christ.

2 Now [c]I praise you, brethren, [d]that ye remember me in all things, [e]and keep the [f]ordinances, as I delivered them to you.

3 But I would have you know, that [g]the Head of every man is Christ; [h]and the head of the woman is the man; [i]and the Head of Christ is God.

4 Every man praying [j]or prophesying, [k]having his head covered, dishonoureth his Head.

5 But every woman that prayeth [l]or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were [m]shaven.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: [n]but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as [o]he is the image and glory of God: [p]but the woman is the glory of the man.

8 For [q]the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.

9 Neither was [r]the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.

10 For this cause ought the woman to have [t]power on her head, [s]because of the angels.

11 Nevertheless, [u]neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord.

12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; [v]but all things of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The mistakes and sins of professed Christians, commonly originate from ignorance of the Scriptures, or from a partial attention to them. If this ignorance, either total or partial, were not common, men could not suppose, that forms, ordinances, or assent to doctrines, would procure them a licence to indulge evil passions, or impunity in the allowed practice of sin.—Men may seem to be converted; they may give a specious account of convictions, terrors, and comforts in regular succession, and make a credible profession of faith; they may be admitted members of the visible church, where the strictest discipline is exercised, and statedly hear the most faithful instruction; they may be greatly distinguished by external privileges and gifts; they may be baptized in any form, and receive the "spiritual meat" and "drink" of the Lord's supper, in the purest societies: and yet, not 'feeding on Christ himself in their hearts by faith, with thanksgiving,' God will not be well pleased with them, but they will die short of Canaan, and perish with the multitude of the ungodly. (Notes, Heb. 3:14—19. 4:1,2.)—So vain are all, even the most scriptural outward signs, or sacramental pledges of salvation, without that "inward and spiritual grace," which is signified by them!

V. 6—13. The examples, recorded in the word of God "for our admonition," who in these latter ages of the world enjoy the full benefit of all preceding revelations, should warn us to repress every evil lusting: to avoid a festive, sensual religion, which gratifies the eye, the ear, the taste; and which connects with "sitting down to eat and drink, and rising up to play;" to keep at a distance from every forbidden indulgence: not to "tempt Christ" by running ourselves into those dangers in which many have perished; and to avoid all "murmurings and disputings," by which the enemy of souls has made immense havoc in the church. Above all, we should beware of "a haughty spirit, which goes before a fall;" and "while we think we stand," we should trust in God to preserve us from deceiving ourselves, and from falling by temptation; using every means of security against evils so fatal and lamentable. In these quiet times, we have "no temptation" to resist, "but such as is common to man:" and if we cannot now stand our ground against the world, the flesh, and the devil, what should we do in the fiery trial of persecution? If not prepared to give up a trifling interest, or worthless indulgence, for Christ's sake; how should we yield our bodies to the flames in his cause?—Whether the world smiles or frowns, it is a dangerous enemy: but if we are believers, we shall be enabled to overcome it, with all its terrors and fascinations: (Notes, John 16:3!—33. 1 John 2: 15—17. 5:4,5.) nor will our faithful God, who "keepeth his covenant and mercy to them that fear him, suffer us to be tempted above what we are able." We may often be alarmed, harassed, baffled, and even cast down; but we shall rise again superior to our foes: for "with every temptation he will make a way for us to escape, that we may be able to bear it." Yet "his fear put into our hearts" will be one great means of our safety: and the greater our humble jealousy is concerning ourselves, the more we shall escape such falls, as, when not fatal, are productive of most painful and mischievous consequences to ourselves and others.

V. 14—22. In all cases, we should "flee from temptation," and every occasion of sin; and not foolishly or ostentatiously parley with it.—If we would be deemed wise and prudent, let us show our wisdom by a circumspect conduct, and not by curious speculations.—Our union and communion with Christ and his people, by partaking of his ordinances, should engage us to avoid all "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," and all conformity to the vanities of the world. When we receive the outward signs of the body and blood of Christ; we should seriously inquire into the sincerity of this profession of faith in him and his atonement; and of our desire to live devoted to his service, and united to his people, as "one bread, and one body," with him and them. For "the world lieth in the wicked one:" ungodly men are the servants of the devil, and false religion is his worship, however ingeniously numbers may varnish over or deny this awful truth: we cannot unite the service of God with that of devils; or have "fellowship with Christ," and with those enemies, whose "works he was manifested to destroy:" (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14 —18. 1 John 3:7—10, v. 8.) and they, who aim at such a coalition, are commonly hypocrites in their religion, and only sincere in their idolatrous worship of mammon. If Christians will venture into those places, and join in those sacrifices, to "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;" (Note, 1 John 2:15—17.) which are of no ill repute even in this favoured land, they will certainly "provoke the Lord to jealousy:" and seeing they cannot endure his omnipotent indignation, why should they foolishly act as if they were "stronger than he?" and what must eventually be the consequence? (Note, Job 40:9—14.)

V. 23—33. Let us not be amused and imposed on with "vain words," about the innocence of this or the other worldly pleasure: these apologies are seldom grounded in truth: but if they were, Are such indulgences "expedient?" Do they tend to edification? Do they consist with charity? Might not the time and money be better employed? Does not the example grieve or mislead others? Let us not then be so selfish, as to seek our own needless indulgence, in preference to the important good of our neighbours.—While we trust in the Lord for our temporal provision, and thankfully receive it as his gift: let us be careful to use our liberty, or plenty, in such a manner, that we may "avoid the appearance of evil," of excess or selfishness, and of whatever may occasion censure or suspicion; and that piety, charity, temperance, and prudence, may so regulate even our feasts and meals, and every part of our conduct, that "whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we may do all to the glory of God." Connected with this great end, we should be careful to give no needless "offence," or occasion any prejudice, in the minds of unbelievers of any description; and not to cause any discord in the church, or disquietude to the consciences even of weak believers: but we should endeavour in all things "to please others" rather than ourselves, as far as it consists with our duty, or can conduce to their profit and salvation; (Note, 2 Cor. 6:3—10. P. O. 1—10.) and yet to displease any man, or body of men, when the will and glory of God are evidently concerned. And let us remember, that he, who gives us these admonitions, and calls us to follow him, as he followed Christ, was the writer of those Scriptures, which most fully declare the doctrines of free grace, and of God's eternal purposes of special love to his chosen people; which therefore must consist with these practical instructions, though many are unable to perceive that consistency.

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1. This verse is most evidently connected with the conclusion of the preceding chapter: it referred to what the apostle had written concerning his own conduct, in the ninth chapter, and it concludes the subject which began in the eighth. (Notes, 8:7—13. 9:13—27 10:29—33.)—He called on the Corinthians to become "imitators of him, even as he imitated Christ," especially in the charitable and cautious use of their Christian liberty: (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.) and he thus hinted, that they had in this respect followed others, who had acted contrary to the will and the example of Christ. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 4:14—17. Phil. 2:1 —8. 3:17—19. 4:8,9. 1 Thes. 1:6—8.)—Followers.] Μιμηται. See on 4:16.

V. 2—16. The apostle here entered on another subject and began to discuss several particulars respecting the public assemblies of the Christians at Corinth; which, with some digressions, he continued to the end of the fourteenth chapter. As he was about to reprove various instances, in which they had been greatly reprehensible; he thought it adviseable to begin by a general commendation of their conduct, in remembering him and observing his injunctions; though this admitted of some exceptions, or some misconstructions had taken place. (Marg. Ref. c—e.) In the abundance of spiritual gifts bestowed on them, several women had been endued with the Spirit of prophecy, which enabled them, by immediate inspiration, to offer prayers for the congregation, or to give instructions, or even to predict future events: for it is not at all reasonable to suppose, that a woman could be said to "prophesy," merely by being present when another prophesied. (Notes, Ex. 15:20,21. Judg. 4:4. 5:1. 1 Sam. 2:1—10. 2 Kings 22:14. Luke 2:36—38. Acts 2:14—21. 21:7—14, vv. 8,9.) This seems to have been the only case in which women were allowed to speak in public, and in this respect some abuses had crept in. (Note, 14:34, 35. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.)—In order to understand what was becoming in this exempt case: the apostle would have them to understand, that Christ was the immediate "Head," or Ruler of every man, whose honour was concerned in his conduct: and that the man was the immediate "head" and ruler of the woman, to whose authority God had subjected her, and who would therefore be disgraced by any impropriety in her behaviour: and that Christ, as Mediator, was subject to God, as his Head and Principal: to whose glory the whole of his administration, in his mediatorial government, was referred. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Note, Phil. 2:9—11.) As therefore Christ did the will and sought the honour of God; so the Christian should avow his subjection to Christ, doing his will and seeking his glory: and the woman should acknowledge her subjection to the man, and, in all things lawful, do what was pleasing and honourable to him. According to the custom of those days, "a veil" on the head was the token of subjection, and respect to superiors: if a man therefore should pray or prophesy with such a covering, he would dishonour "Christ his Head;" by acting out of character, and appearing as if he was placed in subjection to the woman, instead of in authority over her. On the other hand, it would be inconsistent with modesty, and her state of subjection, for a woman to lay aside her veil on such occasions: for thus she would seem to forget her place, and to affect authority; which would dishonour the man, whom God had appointed to be as "a head" over her. Nay, this would be so great an impropriety, that it would be of a similar meaning with the "shaving" of her head: which was a disgraceful punishment, that was sometimes inflicted on women of bad character.—If then the women persisted in exercising their gifts "uncovered, let them be shorn or shaven:" but if they counted this shameful, let them wear their veils.—Some think that these prophetesses had their hair dishevelled, after the manner of the Pythian priestesses of Apollo; and if this was so, it would be an additional reason for the apostle thus strenuously to oppose them.—The man indeed, being "the image and glory of God," and appointed as his representative in ruling over this lower world, ought not to be veiled on these occasions. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, Gen. 1:26,27.) But the woman, reflecting as it were, the glory of the man, being formed his counterpart, and the most honourable subject of his delegated authority, ought to avow her willing subjection by wearing the veil. For the woman was not originally created separately, but taken out of the man; as a part of him, yet inferior to him: neither was the man created for the woman's advantage, but the woman for that of the man. (Notes, Gen. 2:18—25.) On this account therefore, the woman ought to be covered with her veil, even when praying or prophesying, as an emblem of her being under the authority of the man.—Many conjectures have been formed concerning the meaning of the following expression, "because of the angels:" but, probably, the apostle referred to the presence of holy angels, who had witnessed the creation of man as spectators, or were even in some respects joint worshippers with believers, in their public assemblies; which, therefore, ought to be regulated with the most exact propriety, that these heavenly worshippers might not witness any thing unbecoming so holy an occasion. (Marg. Ref. s. Note, Job 38:4—7.)—But though the woman had been created for the man, and subjected to him; yet no difference was made between them in respect of acceptance in Christ, as they were called together to have fellowship with him. Nor ought the authority of the man to be exercised harshly, but in tenderness and love; seeing that, as the woman was originally "from the man," so the man hath ever since been "by the woman;" born of her, and tended on in infancy by her tender care: that, as both were reciprocally means of comfort and benefit to each other, so, they should live together in harmony and affection. But all things were to be considered as derived from God; and regulated by him, whose wise appointments ought to be submitted to. (Marg. Ref. t.) The Corinthians therefore might "judge for themselves," whether according to the constitution of the Creator, it would be comely for a woman to appear uncovered in the act of worshipping him. Even "nature would teach them," that if a man wore his hair long, and tired in the manner which custom had appropriated to women; it would be a disgrace to him, and be considered as a proof of effeminacy and folly. (Note, 2 Sam. 14:25—27.) On the other hand, long hair, when decently tired according to the custom of the times, would be an honour to a woman, being given to her as a natural veil; and to wear her hair short, as men used to do, would appear masculine and disgraceful: and, for the same reason, she ought to wear her veil on her head when praying, that she might keep her proper place and appear in character. These things the apostle stated as decent and proper: but if any of the Corinthian teachers appeared inclinable to excite a contention about them; he would only add, that he and his brethren knew of no such custom as prevailed among them nor was there any such in the churches of God which had been planted by the other apostles. (Marg. Ref. c. Note, 14:36—40.)

V. 17—22. Another exception the apostle must adduce, to the general commendation, which he had bestowed upon the Corinthians: (2) for when they came together, they behaved so disorderly that it conduced to their detriment, rather than to their edification; and thus they lost more in one way, than they gained in others, in respect of religious improvement For, in the first place, when they assembled, as a society met together for the worship of God, in which they ought to have been of one heart and mind; there were divisions, or schisms, among them. Though they met in one place as one congregation: yet they were divided into parties, and were actuated by carnal competition and mutual animosity. This disgraceful report he had heard; and he believed it in part, or concerning a part of them; for he was so acquainted with human nature, and with the temper of the Corinthians, that he was aware these schisms would be followed by heresies also; or by a more entire separation of some of them from the rest, out of zeal for the pernicious doctrines which they had espoused. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, 1:10—16. Rom. 11:25 —32. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.)—'It seems evident from hence, that heresy is something worse than the schism above-mentioned.' Doddridge.—This, Satan was attempting: and God would permit it to take place, in order to distinguish his "approved" servants, by their steadfast adherence to the truth, from the unsound characters who had crept in among them. (Note, 1 John 2:18,19.)—Their assembling together in one place, with divided hearts, was very evil; and their subsequent conduct was so selfish and sensual, that though they professed to celebrate the Lord's supper, they could not be said to do this, but rather to substitute a carnal feast in the stead of it. For they brought their own provisions with them, and ate separately; not waiting for each other, or communicating with each other! So that a self-indulgent or intemperate meal had succeeded to that holy feast of faith and love; and, while the poor went away hungry, for want of proper provision, the rich ate and drank plentifully, if not to excess! (Notes, Gen. 43:34. John 2:6—11.) What could be said to such a scandalous profanation? "Had they not houses" to feast in on their abundance, and to which they might invite their friends? Did they despise the assembled church of God, as if it had been a company of intemperate revellers? Or did the rich purpose to shame their poor brethren, because they had not suitable provisions? Would they have the apostle of Christ applaud such profane, uncharitable, and sensual practices? This he would not do, though glad to praise them when he could. Such a refusal of commendation as this was, implied the severest rebuke. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2 Pet. 2:12—14. Jude 11—13.) It is almost unaccountable that a Christian church, in a short time after this eminent apostle had left them, should run into so abominable a profanation of this sacred institution. But the public feasts of the Greeks were frequently conducted in this manner, which appears to us as inconsistent with civility as with piety. The self-conceited Corinthian teachers carried their notion of Christian liberty, to an excess almost inconceivable at present: they not only joined in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbours, but they introduced the customs of them into the church, and so perverted this sacred feast: and, to show the folly of man's wisdom, they were left thus to disgrace themselves more than any other church, because they thought themselves wiser than others. (Note, 4:9—13.)—It is also wonderful that the apostle should express so favourable an opinion of the professed Christians at Corinth in general, notwithstanding these gross abuses: and we should thence learn caution in condemning whole religious societies, because of those evils, which perhaps but few fully approve, though numbers are seduced to connive at them.—'The Judaizing converts thought themselves obliged to drink plentifully at their festivals; four large cups of wine, saith Dr. Lightfoot, at the paschal supper: and to be quite drunk, saith Buxtorf, at the feast of Purim.' Whithy. (Note, Esth. 9:21—32. P. O. 17—32.) If such sentiments were publicly avowed at the time when the apostle wrote, our astonishment at the facts advanced may be abated; but our abhorrence should be proportionably increased.—'Though the Corinthians had written to St. Paul, requesting his . . . directions in several points; . . . yet they had not said one syllable about the enormities which had crept in amongst them, and in the blame of which they all shared: . . . his information concerning these irregularities, had come to him from other quarters. V. 23—28. To remedy the disorders which prevailed in the Corinthian church, the apostle referred them to the original appointment of the Lord's supper; with which he had been made acquainted by immediate revelation from Christ, and which he had faithfully delivered to them when he was at Corinth. This account of the institution of the Lord's supper entirely coincides with that which has been considered, and fully confirms the interpretation given of it. It was of great importance, that it should be here repeated and enforced, that the obligation of the institution to the end of the world might be fully ascertained. The words "which is broken for you," are here added, to those recorded by Matthew and Mark; and substituted for "which is given for you," in Luke's gospel. (Marg. Ref. n—t. Mark 14:22—25. Luke 22:19,20. Notes, Matt. 26:26—29.) The body of Christ, as "broken," in his sufferings and death, is represented by the bread broken; but an unbroken wafer does not represent this most material circumstance.—It is also here added, that as "oft as they drank of the cup," they ought to do it "in remembrance of" Christ; in order that the frequent recollection of his love, his sufferings, and their obligations to him, might have a proper effect upon their hearts and lives. Whenever they attended on this sacred service, they would "show the Lord's death;" that is, profess their faith in it, and declare the end and efficacy of it, till he should come to judgment. (Marg. Ref. u.) The manner in which the quakers evade this decisive declaration, by saying, till the time when Christ should come, by his spiritual illumination on their minds, to take them off from carnal ordinances, is a striking instance of perverse ingenuity, used in defence of rooted prejudices.—The apostle here repeatedly speaks of "the bread," after its consecration, or appropriation to that particular use; which is decisive against those absurd and monstrous interpretations which have been put upon our Lord's words.—He further declared, that whosoever should partake of this ordinance "unworthily:" that is, in a profane, carnal, or irreverent manner, as an ordinary meal, or a sensual feast, or for secular purposes, would "be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord:" would be chargeable with treating them contemptuously: and, in a measure, with a share of the guilt contracted by those, who wounded his sacred body, and shed his precious blood, upon the cross. (Marg. Ref. x.) It was therefore proper for every man, however approved by his pastors and brethren, "to examine himself," concerning the reality of his faith and repentance, the sincerity of his profession, his intentions in communicating, the state of his heart, and the tenor of his conduct: not in order to find some reason for absenting himself; but that, after such self-examination and serious preparation of heart, he might commemorate the Lord's death in a proper manner, and according to his appointment.—(Marg. Ref. z, a. Note, Matt. 5:23,24.) This expressly shows it to be every Christian's duty, to attend on this sacrament; and that both the bread and the wine should be administered to all without exception. Indeed, in one place, it is in the original, "shall eat this bread, or drink this cup, &c." (27) and the needless variation in our version has caused some cavils of the papists: yet the verse would as readily prove, that the wine alone, as that the bread alone, should be received: but, in fact, it only shows that both bread and wine should be received, in a serious, believing, and reverential manner.—'The true form of celebrating the Lord's supper must be sought from its first institution, of which these were the parts. The pastors must declare the death of the Lord by preaching his word; bless the bread and wine, having called on the name of God, and explained the institution along with their prayers; and finally, deliver the broken bread to be eaten, and the cup to be taken and drunk, with thanksgivings. The flock must prove themselves, that is, carefully examine their knowledge, faith, and repentance; they must "show forth the death of Christ," that is, by true faith consent to his word and appointment; and finally receive the bread from the hand of the minister, and eat it, and drink the wine, and give thanks to the Lord. This was the liturgy of Paul and the apostles. . . . Show. (26) That is, publicly profess that you believe, and embrace it with thanksgiving.' Beza.—From one loaf, our Lord, having broken, gave a portion to each person present, and they all drank from the same cup, as a token that all believers alike partake of the blessings signified in that sacred ordinance, and have communion with one another, as one in Christ. (Note, 10:14—17.) How different this, from a number of people meeting together, to make a meal each separately from the provisions which they had brought with them!—Much has been written, by some expositors, concerning the love-feasts, which are supposed to have accompanied the administration of the Lord's supper in the primitive times, as having given occasion to the disorders which the apostle here reproves: but it is not certain, that he at all refers to them; and indeed it is not certain, or very probable, that they were at this time in use. (Notes, 2 Pet 2 12—14. Jude 11—13.)

V. 29—34. To show still further the necessity of self-examination, the apostle declared that every one, who unworthily partook of this sacred feast, would "eat and drink [a] judgment to himself." (Marg.) His very attendance on this religious service would offend God, and expose him to his righteous judgment; because he made no proper discrimination between the bread and wine, which represented the Lord's body as offered on the cross a sacrifice for our sins, to be received by faith, and an ordinary meal. This irreverence, being a heinous crime, would doubtless subject a man to final condemnation, if he did not repent: but certainly the apostle did not mean, that it was in its own nature unpardonable; or that it sealed a man's damnation, as very many have supposed: for he was addressing Christians, and warning them to beware of incurring those temporal judgments with which God chastised his offending servants.—The scruples and consequent neglect of numbers, who seem in other things to obey Christ, have no ground in this passage, except in the apparent harshness of our translation, in which the word that signifies "judgment," is rendered damnation; and this commonly means eternal punishment. Indeed, the conscious unworthiness, and lamented infirmities of those, who desire to express their gratitude for redeeming love, are widely different from the profanations of these Corinthians, who yet were not at all supposed to have sinned beyond the hope of pardon: and generally they, who deem themselves most unworthy, are least likely to receive "unworthily;" which is commonly the sin of the careless, or proud, and self-sufficient.—But the apostle more fully explained his meaning in what follows: for he observed, that, on account of these profanations, many of them were visited with enfeebling and wasting sickness; and several had even been cut off by death: which, being called "sleep," was charitably supposed to be that of believers. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, 5:1—5. 1 Kings 13:20—32. P. O. 20—34. Notes, 2 Kings 22:15—20. 2 Chr. 35:20—24.) For, if men would call themselves to an account for their conduct, and humble themselves before God in deep repentance; they would escape many temporal calamities, as well as final condemnation: but when Christians were thus judged, and visited [b] with divers diseases and sundry kinds of death, [c] "they were chastened of the Lord, that," being led to repentance, "they might not be condemned with the world." (Marg. Ref. e—g.) As this was the case, the apostle exhorted them to "tarry" for each other, and to commemorate the death of their most gracious Lord, in charity and peace, as well as in faith and piety: and let them satisfy their hunger at home, and not think of making a full meal, or a sensual feast, of the Lord's supper; by which they exposed themselves to condemnation and very painful visitations, even when meeting together in the Saviour's name. As to the rest, he purposed to come shortly, and then he would regulate matters by his apostolical authority.—It is manifest, that the custom, which some scrupulously adhere to, as a matter of conscience, often to the injury of their health, of receiving the Lord's supper fasting, has not the smallest ground in Scripture, and is in fact a mere superstition: as is the still much more common notion, that irreverence, or even involuntary defects and mistakes, in this sacrament, are far more heinous and perilous, than in other acts of worship; or even in administering or receiving baptism. —It should also be observed, that the apostle does not speak of worthy or unworthy participants; but of eating and drinking unworthily. Not the character of the person, but the manner of receiving the Lord's supper, forms his direct subject.—[d] 'We do not presume to come to this thy table, trusting in our own righteousness; but in thy manifold and great mercies. We are not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under thy table.' Communion Service. The self-righteous must then receive most unworthily, because he proudly thinks himself worthy: and that man comes in the most worthy manner, who approaches in deep humility, profound reverence, simple dependence on the mercy of God, through the atoning blood of Christ, and lively gratitude for favours so entirely undeserved. [e] 'So is the danger great, if we receive the same unworthily: for then we are guilty of the body and blood of Christ our Saviour: we eat and drink our own damnation, not considering the Lord's body: we kindle God's wrath against us: we provoke him to plague us with divers diseases, and sundry kinds of death.' Exhortation. Communion Service. The concluding words explain what precedes, but by no means so clearly, as the apostle explains what he intended by "eating and drinking judgment to himself," and the former part is often misunderstood, and excites many needless fears and scruples in the minds of humble and conscientious believers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. We ought to imitate no man, any further than he imitates Christ, whose example alone is absolutely perfect: nor should we desire that others should follow us, except as we are enabled to follow our Lord and Master.—When we must blame in some things; we should show a disposition to be pleased, by commending and excusing whatever will admit of it.—In order to know our duty in various particulars, we should accurately study our relations to God, and to each other in society and in the church. His plan of government includes a regular subordination. The immediate government of mankind, especially of Christians, is vested in One who bears our nature, and who, as Mediator, acknowledges "the Father as his Head:" under this mediatorial authority, he has appointed man to be the head of the woman, who immediately rules over her; that, "as the image and glory of God," he may in this, and other instances of relative authority, shadow forth the glory and obligations of the divine government. But the Lord has so arranged matters, both in the kingdom of providence, and in that of grace; that the authority of the superior, and the subjection of the inferior, relations, should conduce to the mutual help and benefit of all concerned. (Notes, Eph. 5:22—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) Even nature and the common sense of mankind, require that men and women should preserve a due distinction in their apparel, behaviour, and appearance; and the contrary to this is contemptible and odious. The particulars, by which this distinction shall be expressed, are greatly determined by custom; but, however fashions may vary, an effeminate man, and a masculine woman, will always be disgusting and disgraceful. —The believer's conduct should be so regulated, that it may "honour Christ his Head;" for even his indiscretions, and improprieties, will in a measure dishonour his profession: in like manner, the conduct of women will either do credit to their husbands and those who stand nearly related to them, or it will disgrace them. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:4,5. P. O. 8—16.) Much attention therefore to decorum is necessary: but especially, in every thing relating to the worship of God, where nothing unseemly, or improper for any one's state, rank, or character, ought to be tolerated. And not only should our sense of the Lord's special presence influence our conduct in this manner; but even that of the holy angels, who, in our assemblies, must witness many things unworthy of the sacred service, and which ought carefully to be avoided.

V. 17—22. Alas! how often do even the professors of the gospel "meet together for the worse instead of the better!" Especially, how frequently do animosities and personal or party contentions divide religious societies, and corrupt the apparently united worship! Indeed, in the present state of human nature, such "schisms" and "heresies" cannot altogether be avoided: but, while we adore the wisdom of God, in overruling these evils for the manifestation of those who are approved by him; we must by no means palliate the guilt of such persons, who thus divide and distract the church. The Lord, indeed, can take occasion from the most aggravated profanations, to establish the most beneficial regulations, of which this chapter gives us a striking specimen; but that display of his wisdom and goodness is far from excusing the criminals, or exempting them from punishment. (Note, Rom. 3:5—8.) We should rejoice, that we are under no temptation to pervert the Lord's supper to an intemperate revel; but we may seriously inquire, whether profanations, equally flagrant and expressive of contempt, are not common among us. How often do avarice, ambition, and extrava-

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle instructs the Corinthians in the origin, nature, variety, and use of "spiritual gifts," 1—11. He illustrates the subject, by showing how the members in the human body perform their several functions for the benefit of the whole, 12—26: and applies this to the church, and its different orders of ministers, and members, 27—30. He concludes with exhortation, 31.

NOW, concerning [a]spiritual gifts, brethren, [b]I would not have you ignorant.

2 Ye know [c]that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these [d]dumb idols, [e]even as ye were led.

3 Wherefore I give you to understand, that [f]no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus [g]accursed; and that [g]no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

4 Now [h]there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit.

5 And there are differences of [i]administrations, [i]but the same Lord.

6 And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which [k]worketh [l]all in all.

7 But [m]the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.

8 For to one [n]is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit;

9 To another [o]faith by the same Spirit; to another [p]the gifts of healing by the same Spirit;

10 To another [q]the working of miracles; to another [r]prophecy; to another [s]discerning of spirits; to another [t]divers kinds of tongues; [u]to another the interpretation of tongues:

gance send their infidel, impious, or profligate votaries, to qualify for preferment by this sacred institution! How often do custom and ostentation lead sinners of superior rank to exhibit their petty distinctions, even in attending on this sacrament, which especially requires our most humble gratitude! How often is it made the support of Pharisaical pride, or the cloak with which hypocrites cover dishonesty, or secret licentiousness! Shall we praise men for such things? Surely not! nay, we must most strenuously and decidedly protest against them: and pray earnestly and constantly to God, to incline the hearts of those who have authority in the church, to use proper and effectual methods, with impartial decision, of terminating such scandalous practices; doing all we can in the mean time, in our several places, to counteract and prevent them; without fearing reproach or persecution, in whatever form it may come upon us.

V. 23—34. Those who understand what the apostles "received" from Christ, and "delivered to" the church, respecting the interesting season when the Lord's supper was appointed, even that very night, in which the Saviour was betrayed: and concerning the meaning, use, and benefit of it, will be fully convinced, that a penitent heart, a simple reliance on God's free mercy by faith in Christ, according to "the new covenant in his blood;" a thankful recollection of his sufferings and of his love; a desire "to show his death," to profess our obligations to him, and to give up ourselves to his service, in doing good to his people, and to all men for his sake, constitute the proper preparation for acceptably communicating. All, who aim and pray to be enabled to come in this frame of heart and mind, are bound in gratitude, and by their professed subjection to Christ, to "show the Lord's death till he come." Such persons are not likely "to eat and drink unworthily," or to be "guilty of the body and blood of Christ;" and their fears and scruples are in general the effect of mistake: for every one is fit to come to this sacred service, who can pray for spiritual blessings in the name of Christ, without hypocrisy, and in an acceptable manner. There should, however, be an habitual self-examination; and a more particular one, at those times, when we have opportunity: this will more and more convince the humble believer of the difference between his case, and that of profane, proud, and carnal communicants. The same method will prevent other evils and mistakes, which might bring chastisements upon us. But the end of self-examination should be renewed repentance, acceptance of Christ, and prayer for grace to enable us to "discern the Lord's body," and to attend on this sacred feast in a humble, spiritual, and grateful manner; and not to find excuses for neglecting 'this our bounden duty and service.'—In every respect we act most wisely for our present comfort, as well as for our future good, when we "judge ourselves, that we may not be judged of the Lord." Our personal and family trials should remind us, that he has a controversy with us: but, as we are apt to be partial, or dilatory, in "judging ourselves," we should count it a mercy to be "chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world;" and to suffer any thing, even unto death, by which we may escape the eternal damnation of the wicked. (Note, 5:1—5.) Yet it is prudent for us to act with such caution, piety, charity, seriousness, and temperance; that we may, as much as we can, avoid chastenings, which "for the present seem not joyous, but grievous," though they afterwards bring forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby."

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1—3. The Corinthians were favoured with a rich abundance of miraculous gifts by the power of the Holy Spirit, which they exercised principally in their public assemblies: and, as they were divided into parties, it seems that they vied with each other, in the display of these endowments. (Notes, 14:) This gave rise to vainglory, envy, corrupt emulation and repinings, which were equally opposite to piety and charity. To remedy these grievous evils, the apostle began his observations on the subject, by reminding them of what they had been a short time before. (Notes, Gal. 4:8—11. Eph. 2:11—13.) He would not have them ignorant of the origin and proper use of spiritual gifts; (Note, 1:4—9.) for, though they prided themselves on their knowledge, they were in great danger of remaining entirely without instruction, in many practical matters of prime importance. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) They could not, however, but know, that they had in general been Gentiles, who were carried away by a blind attachment to their idols; even as they were led captive by their lusts, by their priests, and by Satan. These were dumb idols, notwithstanding all that was boasted concerning their oracles; and therefore they could not confer on their deluded votaries those gifts of tongues, and that utterance, which the converts to Christianity had now received, and which must be ascribed exclusively to the sovereign grace and power of God. It was, therefore, proper for them to understand, that all such gifts were confined within the limits of the Christian church: so that no man, whether Jew or Gentile, who blasphamed the name of Jesus, or treated him as a deceiver that deserved the death of the cross, "spake by the Holy Spirit;" but his pretended or apparent inspiration must be ascribed, either to human imposture, or to diabolical agency. (Notes, John 16: 14,15. 1 John 4:1—3.) On the other hand, no man could sincerely confess "Jesus to be the Lord," the promised Messiah, the Son of God, according to his own declarations concerning himself; except he spake under the influence of the Holy Spirit. The knowledge and belief of this truth, and the boldness to profess it, must come from that blessed Agent. In this important sense, all true Christians had "spiritual gifts;" and none ought either to despise another, or to think himself overlooked, if he were not favoured with such as were more coveted, but less valuable.—The context, however, leads us to suppose the apostle meant, that this confession, from the mouth even of a nominal Christian, being made under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, (as wicked Balaam prophesied,) was "a spiritual gift," which might benefit other, though it should prove of no use to the possessor.—'Nor can they, who confirm the doctrine of Christ by miracles, be acted on by any other but the Holy Ghost: for no evil spirit would assist them to confirm a doctrine so opposite to, and destructive of, their kingdom and designs.' Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 12:25—28. Mark 9:38—40. Luke 9:46—50.) The expression, "say, that Jesus is the Lord," more obviously signifies, the profession of the true doctrine concerning Christ, than the exercise of saving faith in him, especially in a discourse concerning "spiritual gifts;" or, as some would render it, "spiritual men," or men possessing spiritual gifts, such as are afterwards enumerated, (8—10.) to qualify them for public stations in the church. (28) Many have "prophesied in the name of Christ," as well as preached and defended his truth, who were "workers of iniquity;" yet, as far as they avowed "that Jesus was the Lord," they spake by the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 13:1—3. Matt. 7:21—23. 1 John 4:1—3.)—The contrast between saying "Jesus is an accursed thing," and "Jesus is the Lord," is very emphatical.

were also different "administrations" or offices, in which men ministered to the benefit of the church, according to the work assigned, and the talents intrusted to them: but they were all the servants of Christ; and were dependent on the same Lord, and accountable to him. (Notes, Rom. 12:3—5. Eph. 4:7—16.) In the effects which followed the exercise of their gifts, whether in miraculous cures, or in the conversion of sinners; the whole was produced by the power "of the same God," who wrought all these changes on the bodies and souls of men, through his Son, and by his Spirit, for the glory of his own great name. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) But "the manifestation of the Spirit," in these extraordinary operations, was not made for the credit of the man by whom he wrought, but for the advantage of the church, and even of those without; that the person, who possessed these gifts, or filled up any office in the church, might profit others: for such gifts were entirely distinct from that gracious state of the heart, which disposes a man to improve his talents of every kind. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, Matt. 25:14—30.) For the purpose of thus profiting others, the Holy Spirit conferred on one "the word of wisdom," by which may be intended such immediate discoveries of the grand scheme of salvation, attended with such powers of discoursing about it, as were suited to render other men "wise unto salvation." (Note, Eph. 3:9—12.) To another, the same Spirit gave "the word of knowledge," by which an exact and extraordinary understanding of the Old Testament types and prophecies, and a capacity of explaining difficult subjects, of answering objections, of determining cases of conscience, or of speaking suitable words to different descriptions of persons, seems to be meant. (Marg. Ref. n.) Another was endued with a remarkable degree of faith; which rendered him capable of engaging in very perilous services, for which persons of more exact knowledge might be less competent. This kind and degree of faith was distinct from that faith which justifies; and so might be considered as "a spiritual gift," bestowed on certain persons to enable them to profit others. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, 13:1—3.) Some were endued with the gift of performing miraculous cures: others were enabled to work miracles of divers kinds. Some predicted future events; others had a supernatural talent of discerning spirits, of perceiving by what principles men were actuated, and of what services they were capable. Some could speak in various languages, which they had not learned; and others could miraculously interpret their words to the hearers, who understood them not. (Marg. Ref. p—u. Note, 14:26—33.) All these endowments the Holy Spirit freely bestowed, in that measure and diversity which he saw good, and to be conducive to the common advantage of the church: so that no one had any ground of glorying over others, or of repining as if he were forgotten in this distribution.—There is indeed much difficulty, at present, in determining precisely what the apostle meant by each of the terms here used, which doubtless were readily understood at the time when the gifts spoken of were exercised: but the sense which appeared most probable has been chosen; and great exactness on such a subject is not at all necessary.—"All these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit; dividing to every one severally as he will;" (11) compared with, "It is the same God, which worketh all in all;" suggests a conclusive proof of the Personality, Sovereignty, and Deity of the Holy Spirit. V. 12—14. The apostle next illustrated the wisdom and goodness of the Holy Spirit, in his distribution of these gifts, by the similitude of the human body. This, though formed of many members, constituted one harmonious whole: while every member had its proper use and capacity, for the common benefit. Thus Christ mystical, or his church as united to him its glorious Head, was one great whole, consisting of many parts. (15—26. Marg. Ref. z. Notes, Rom. 12:3——5. Gal. 3:15—18.) For all true Christians had been baptized into Christ's mystical body, by the communication of his life-giving Spirit, whether they were before Jews or Gentiles, slaves or freemen, and by deriving continual supplies of that same Spirit, in answer to their earnest desires and believing prayers, they were made "to drink into one Spirit," and became more and more of "that mind which was in Christ." (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 10:1—5. Ex. 17:5,6. Cant. 5:1. Is. 44:3—5. 55:1—3. Zech. 9:13—16, v. 15. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39. Eph. 4:1—6. 5:15—20, v. 18.) Here the apostle doubtless alluded to the wine used in the Lord's supper; as before to baptism. (Notes, 10:14—22.)—Therefore as the body is one, and has one common interest, though it consists of many members; so Christians should be considered, as incorporated by faith in Christ, and "the supply of his Spirit." Whereas if they had all possessed the same gifts, they would have resembled a detached member, or several of the same kind, rather than a regularly organized body.

V. 15—26. From the preceding illustration, the Corinthians might see the folly and perniciousness of their emulations, covetings, and murmurs. For, supposing there could be a distinct consciousness in each of the members of the human body; and should "the foot," dissatisfied with its lowly laborious, and useful station, covet the function and the powers of the hand: and complain that, as this was not granted, it could not be accounted a part of the body or at all regarded in it, must not every one see that this would be false and frivolous? The same would be the case, if the ear should repine, because not placed in the office, and possessed of the powers, of the eye. For if every part of the body were formed into an eye, where would be the important sense of hearing? Instead of such monstrous productions, God has, wisely and kindly, placed the members, senses, and organs, in the human body, "as it pleased him;" and unspeakably better than any self-wise counsellor could have directed. The very idea of every member coveting to be the most honoured part, is associated with that of the destruction of the body; which necessarily consists of many different members, so formed and placed as to become one regular whole. (Marg. Ref. f—m.) Thus, the eye could say, that it did not want the assistance of the hand; for without the power of exacuting, of which the hand is the instrument, even sight would be of small value. Nay, the head itself, the seat or source of sensation and reflection, wants the help of the feet, to convey it about from place to place. This appears still more clearly, in respect of those parts which seem "feeble," and yet are absolutely necessary to life, or to the well-being of the whole; such as the various vessels, by which digestion, nutrition, and circulation are carried on; and by which, whatever is redundant or detrimental, is thrown off by natural and regular process. So far, in fact, are the more honourable parts of the body from appropriating the whole of a man's regard, that the contrary often takes place: and those parts, which we are accustomed to conceal as "less honourable," are covered and decorated with the greatest care and expense. For those which are deemed most "honourable," do not want such decoration, being comely in themselves. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) And if any part of the body is wounded, diseased, or pained, all other parts sympathize with it, and share the suffering, and are ready to ease or relieve it: and, on the other hand, they all seem to rejoice, and share the pleasure of that member, which is in health and at ease; or which is employed in any honourable or beneficial service. V. 27—31. The apostle here applies this most appropriate similitude to the case which he intended to illustrate. The church was the mystical body of Christ, and believers "were, in particular, members" of that body. In placing these members, God, in his sovereign and unerring wisdom, had appointed some to the first and most honourable office of apostles; to whom especially he had "given the word of wisdom," for the instruction of mankind. Next to them, he had placed others as prophets, who gave particular instructions, by immediate inspiration, as by "the word of knowledge:" and after them he had stationed pastors and teachers, to superintend and instruct particular congregations, or to preach occasionally in other places. Besides the gifts and authority conferred on these persons; many Christians were endued with the power of working miracles, and of healing the sick: others were qualified to attend, and be assistant to, the apostles in their labours, as evangelists: or, as some explain it, to help the pastors in the office of deacons, and in various other services. Some were qualified to preside over the secular affairs of the church, as governors: or they were suitable persons to be left in authority by the apostles, when they were forced away from newly planted churches: "that they might set in order such things as were wanting:" while others were best qualified, by speaking a variety of tongues, to attempt the conversion of those who had not yet heard the gospel. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) But, would it be proper that all Christians should be apostles, prophets, teachers, or evangelists? This evidently was not the case: and if it could be thus ordered; the church would be like a body, which was all eye, all hand, or all tongue; like an army, constituted wholly of general officers; or like a kingdom in which all were rulers: (Notes, 4—11. Deut. 32:4. Rom. 12:6—8. Eph. 4:1—6,11—16. Col. 3:12—15.)—The Christians at Corinth, indeed, "coveted earnestly," or were emulous of the best gifts, or such as were deemed most splendid and honourable: but the apostle was about to show them a more excellent way, even that of love; (Marg. Ref. q, x. Notes, 13:) which would influence them to be content with the gifts already conferred, and to be principally zealous in making an useful improvement of them. (Notes, 14:)—Our translation, indeed, renders the clause as an exhortation, but it may with equal exactness be translated, "Ye do covet earnestly," &c. and so imply a reprehension of the corrupt emulation of the Corinthians: and this certainly coincides far better with the argument of the apostle. For exhorting them to "covet the best gifts;" or those that were most valued, which the Holy Spirit distributed as he saw good: would have sanctioned that ambitious temper, which he evidently aimed to repress.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Acute speculators are often most ignorant o practical subjects: those who are most elated with the gift bestowed on them, are commonly most forgetful of the Giver and the proper use of them; and "spiritual gifts" have frequently been the support of spiritual pride. (Note, 27—31.) —In order to prevent these evils, we should often recollect what we were by nature and practice. We have not indeed been "carried after dumb idols:" yet "we were by nature children of wrath, even as others;" we have idolized worldly objects; and most of us have been the "enemies of God by wicked works," after which we were carried away from the truth and will of God, even as Satan, the world, and the flesh led us. If then we have any knowledge of the truth, or any ability to communicate that knowledge to others; let us give the whole glory to God.—There have been many who advanced a claim to inspiration, or extraordinary illumination of one kind or other; and there still are those who advance such claims: but appearances of this kind must be counterfeit in all, who refuse the Lord Jesus those honours, which he demanded to himself. For, what do such men, but "call Jesus accursed?" They may speak of him as a good Man, or an able Teacher: but, while they reject his priesthood, and deny his Deity as One with the Father: what do they less than charge him with blasphemy and imposture, in evidently claiming this equality; and with abetting idolatry, in teaching "all men to honour the Son, even as they honour the Father?" (Notes, John 5:19—23. 10:26—31, v. 30.) And do they not, in effect, justify the Jewish rulers in putting him to death as "an Anathema," for saying, "I am the Son of God?" Can such men speak by the Holy Spirit, or according to the language of inspiration? But if indeed we can from our hearts say that "Jesus is the Lord;" if we adore him with Thomas, saying, "My Lord, and my God!" and if we as sinners, trust and obey him, as our divine Saviour, Teacher, and King; we may be sure that we profess his faith "by the Holy Spirit;" though we cannot explain the manner, in which he has wrought this conviction, and though we be destitute of all other spiritual gifts. Indeed, we do not now expect miraculous gifts: yet "the word of wisdom and of knowledge," and divers special endowments by "the same Spirit," according to our different services to "the same Lord," and that we may be the instruments in those "operations of the same God, who worketh all in all," may yet be depended on by us. Whatever station, therefore, be allotted us, and, whatever abilities we possess for the duties of that station; we should remember, "that they were given us to profit withal." Even a capacity of speaking in a proper and scriptural manner, on any topic of religion, will not profit a man; except he have grace, humbly and simply to improve his talent, for the edification of others, without seeking his own glory or emolument. Such endowments will indeed infallibly expose the possessor to many additional temptations: and, as he will need a larger measure of grace than his more obscure brethren do, to keep him humble and spiritual; so he will probably meet with a more abundant share of painful experiences, and humiliating dispensations. We have therefore little cause to envy those, who are eminent in abilities and popularity, to covet these dangerous distinctions, to glory in any measure of them bestowed on us, or to despise such as are destitute of them. Numbers have thus been ruined: being lifted up in pride, they have come short of that salvation which they preached to others; or they have been betrayed into such evils, as have caused them to terminate their days in disgrace and distress. And the few, who have not been apparently injured, by eminency in gifts and popularity, have generally had more to relate concerning "thorns in the flesh, and messengers of Satan to buffet them," than their less gifted and admired brethren had any conception of. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Cor. 12:1—10.)

V. 12—26. We ought most earnestly to inquire, as our grand concern, whether we have been "baptized into the body of Christ," by his regenerating grace: and whether we are "drinking into his Spirit," by receiving daily from his fulness. If this be our privilege, we should be abundantly thankful for so valuable a distinction, and contentedly occupy the place, which it hath pleased God to assign us in his church: we should attentively consider the relation, in which we stand to the Head, and to every member of this mystical body; seek to have our hearts filled with love to the whole, and to every part of the Church of Christ, estimate soberly the functions of our station, and pray in faith and hope for wisdom and grace, that we may be enabled to perform them. We should also watch against pride, ambition, envy, discontent, selfishness, contempt of others; and thus seek the good of the church, of those in our own sphere of action, and of every individual, by properly improving our talents, and performing the duty of our station. If situated in the lowest place, we should not disdain its services as beneath us: if advanced to a higher station, we should not imagine, that we do not stand in need of the prayers and help of our feeblest and most obscure brethren; for these are essential to the perfection of the whole. Nay, we should guard and take care of the weak and feeble believer; even as the God of nature has, with exquisite skill and kindness, defended those parts of the body, which, though essential to life and health, might otherwise easily be wounded and destroyed; and cover with affectionate attention the infirmities and uncomeliness of those, whom we have reason to regard as real believers, and who are exposed to disgrace and contempt: that so "the more abundant honour may be given to that part which lacked;" seeing the more honourable of our brethren have no need of such particular assistance and support from us. Our kind Creator hath effectually provided, that there should be "no schism in" our natural body: ut he has for wise reasons seen good to make trial of the members of the mystical body of Christ, in this respect; and through the remainder of error and sin in real Christians, through the intrusion of hypocrites, and the artifices of the enemy, many disgraceful and lamentable divisions still prevail; which we should pray against, and endeavour to heal to the utmost of our power, and with persevering earnestness. (Note, and P. O. Eph. 4:1—6.)

V. 27—31. In proportion as the members of Christ have not the same care of others as of themselves, very injurious consequences will manifestly ensue. If all filled up their several places in entire and equal love; there could be no envyings, jealousies, murmurs, vainglory, self-seeking, or disregard of others, any more than there is in heaven. (Note, Matt. 6:10.) We should, in that case, every one reciprocally care for all the rest; we should sympathize with the afflicted, tempted, distressed, or fallen believer, and help him as we could; we should feel ourselves sharers in the disgrace and reproach of the poor and needy; deem ourselves honoured and prospered, in the reputation, success, and usefulness of our more distinguished brethren; and rejoice in the consolation of such as were glad in the Lord. The meanest Christian would not then repine or envy the most exalted; but rejoice and bless God on his account: the most eminent would not disregard the meanest; but would peculiarly endeavour to encourage and help him. Thus the good of the whole, and of every part, would be the uniform object of all, in every station, without any exception; and with the subordination of all personal interests and satisfactions to this superior end. Instead of "coveting earnestly" the highest stations, or the most conspicuous gifts; instead of acting, as if all were to be apostles, prophets, teachers, and rulers; we should then unreservedly leave the appointment of his servants to God, and those whom he employs in his providence: and we should choose "the most excellent" way of love; endeavouring to occupy with our measure of ability and influence, for the good of our brethren, till our Lord come: remembering, that they will not be most approved and commended at that time, who affected or occupied the chief places; but those who have been most faithful to the trust reposed in them, and most diligent in their Master's work. (Note, Matt. 20:24—28)

NOTES.—Chap. XIII. V. 1—3. The more effectually to expose the radical error of the Corinthians, in overvaluing spiritual gifts, and seeking their own credit in the use of them, without due regard to the benefit of their brethren; the apostle in this chapter declares the most eminent of these gifts to be comparatively nothing, and "love" to be every thing. (Notes, 2:3—5. 12:27—31. 14:1—5. 2 Cor. 10:7—11.) He had told them, that he would "show them a more excellent way;" and he here averred, (as concerning himself, to give the less offence,) that if he could speak all the variety of human languages most perfectly; and if he could discourse in them with the eloquence of angels, or even use their heavenly language, yet; without love, he should merely resemble the unmeaning sound of the most common and less harmonious musical instruments. (Notes, 14:6—12. Acts 2:4—11.) Nay, could he also deliver prophecies, which should be verified by the most signal accomplishment; if he could understand, and even comprehend, all divine mysteries; if he were possessed of all the natural and religious knowledge imaginable; and if he could exercise that special faith on the power of Christ, by which miracles were wrought, to such a degree, that even mountains should literally be removed at his word, to the universal astonishment of mankind; yet without "love" he should be nothing, not a Christian at all, and so far beneath the meanest believer upon earth. (Marg Ref. a—n. Notes, 8:1—3. 12:4—11. Matt. 7:21—23. 21:21,22. Mark 11:20—26. Luke 17:5,6. Eph. 3:1—7.)—Nay, if from pride, ostentation, or similar motives, he should "give all his goods to feed the poor," even to the starving of himself, from selfish motives; or if, from party zeal and obstinate attachment to a system, he should "give his body to be burned" as a martyr; yet, without "love," he could be nothing better than a deluded enthusiast, or ambitious hypocrite, and should derive no benefit from it. The apostle meant to show, in the strongest instances imaginable, that nothing could prove a man a true believer, who had not love. Some of the cases which he states cannot be supposed to have ever existed: yet it seems evident from Scripture, that a man might have the largest degree of that faith, by which miracles were performed, without any of the "faith which worketh by love;" and that it is possible for a person to expend all his wealth in alms, and die a martyr not only for error and superstition, but even for the truth, without saving grace!—The word "charity" has been of late so appropriated to one external expression of love, which yet may be produced from other principles; that it is desirable for the word "love" to be here substituted, according to the exact meaning of the original, in order to render the passage more intelligible to common readers.—'It must here be taken in the noblest sense, for such a love to the whole church, and the whole world, as arises from principles of true piety, and ultimately centres in God.' Doddridge.

V. 4—7. The effects of "love," here enumerated, show that the apostle primarily intended those exercises of that holy affection, which respect mankind. Yet it is equally evident, that no natural benevolence, which subsists in an unbeliever's heart, can at all answer to the description which he has given. Indeed he evidently meant that love, which is "the fruit of the Spirit" in the believer's heart, and by which especially "faith worketh." (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6, v. 6. 22—26, v. 22. 1 Pet. 1:22. 1 John 3:13—15. 4:7,8.) The humble penitent, obtaining pardon and peace by faith in Christ, finds his self-confidence and his attachment to the world deprived of dominion and greatly weakened: he is also taught to love the perfections, the holiness, and the cause of God; the person, truth, and precepts of Christ, and his image in his people; to love his neighbours, and even his enemies, after the example of Christ and in obedience to his commands; and he now desires, that they should all be happy, and that God should be glorified in their salvation. This love therefore includes all parties, nations, and characters, in its expansive exercise; though still capable of more particular attachments. It regards both the temporal and eternal interests of mankind; and the external comfort, as well as spiritual advantage, of believers; and, in subordination to the love of God, it seeks to promote the benefit of mankind, and the peace and prosperity of the church, as its grand objects. This love is the unequivocal evidence of regeneration; and it is a better touchstone of men's professed faith in Christ, than even the love of God; because its effects may more easily be examined and ascertained, and there is less danger of false affections in it. (Notes, 1 John 3:16,17. 4:20,21.) It was also that part of the Christian temper, in which the Corinthians were peculiarly defective: the apostle therefore selected this subject, to show them, how low an estimate ought to be made of their religion, and so to abate their high opinion of themselves. We must further observe that he described "love," as a man would gold, by enumerating its properties in the abstract. Wherever it subsisted, it had those properties, whether its quantity were small or great: and by this a man might estimate his own attainments in real religion. Some love might exist, where great remains of selfish passions obstructed its exercise; as a little gold may be mixed with a large alloy of base metal: but it would then become less conspicuous, and the man's state more doubtful.—"Love suffereth long;" it influences us, as far as it prevails, to endure the most grievous injuries and provoking affronts for a long time together, without resentment or retaliation. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, Ex. 34:5—7. Ps. 86:14,15. Rom. 2:4—6. Col. 3:12—15.) Love "is kind," even to the most injurious; persevering in endeavours "to overcome evil with good;" and delighting in showing kindness to all sorts of persons, by word and deed. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Rom. 12: 9—21. Eph. 4:30—32. 5:1,2.) "Love envieth not;" or, is not emulous and ambitious: as far as it rules in the heart, it represses pride and selfishness; and causes men to rejoice in the comfort, advantage, and honour even of those, whom nature would regard as enemies or rivals. "Love vaunteth not itself;" it is a humble, unostentatious principle; it never prompts a man to boast, to push himself into notice, to prefer himself to others, to act with rashness or insolence, or in an overbearing dogmatical spirit. "It is not puffed up:" it never leads a person to be elated by endowments, offices, applause, or popularity: for where love prevails, these are only regarded and valued as means of good to others, communicated from God, to whom all the honour of them belongs. (Notes, 4:6—8,18—21. 5:1—5. 8:1—3. 2 Cor. 12:17—21.) "Love doth not behave itself unseemly:" it guides a man to a gentle, beneficent, courteous, compassionate, respectful conduct, suited to his employment, relative duties, age, and station: and thus it preserves him from rashness, and those improprieties into which pride and selfishness betray others. (Marg. Ref. o, p.) For he, who is influenced by love, will keep the good of mankind continually before him as his object: and this will restrain him from those evil tempers and unbecoming actions, which would counteract his grand design. Love "seeketh not its own:" it never prompts men to seek their own ease, interest, credit, or indulgence, except in subordination to the welfare of others and the glory of God: and it does not allow them to seek any selfish end, in the use of their gifts and talents, which are conferred on them to profit others with. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 10:23—28. Phil. 2:1—4.) Love "is not easily provoked:" it is not passionate and furious, any more than revengeful; it does not readily take offence even at many or great affronts, which pride and self-love would deem intolerable. Love "thinketh no evil:" it is unsuspecting, and not apt to impute men's conduct to bad motives, without evident proof; it can therefore never prompt any one to invent or circulate slanders, to believe malicious reports, or even needlessly to expose the faults of others; but it will rather influence him to extenuate or conceal them, when this can be done consistently with other duties. (Note, Matt. 7:1,2.) For love "rejoiceth not in iniquity:" it is not gratified, (as pride and malevolence are,) with the report of the vices and follies of others, though belonging to another party, or regarded as opposers; it rather influences a man to weep over it, and to desire that it should be found erroneous. "But love rejoiceth in the truth;" it excites joy in the heart, when the triumphs of the truth, and the holy lives of such as profess it, are mentioned, or when aspersed characters are vindicated by the truth being made known; or when Christians, however distinguished, act with truth, sincerity, integrity, professing and adorning the truth of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) "Love beareth all things:" it covers all faults, as far as it can properly be done: it bears with the infirmities and mistakes of others, with candour and kindness; and it submits to any inconvenience cheerfully, which this forbearance imposes. (Notes, Prov. 10:12. Rom. 15:1—3. Gal. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 4:8.) Love "believeth all things:" it disposes a person to believe the most favourably of all others, till the contrary be proved; to act as counsel for the accused; and even to credit a man's apologies for his faults, his professions of repentance, and his purposes of amendment. (Note, Luke 17:3,4.) "Love hopeth all things:" it prompts a man to hope the best of another's character and intentions, which the case will fairly allow him; to hope for the conversion of the sinner, or the recovery of the backslider; to proceed with hope, in his attempts to do good to the most profligate, obstinate, and ungrateful: and it allows no one to despair of others, to be wearied out by their perverseness, or to give up all endeavours for their good: and so consign sinners of any description, as hopeless, to inevitable and eternal destruction. (Note, Luke 15:25—32.) In this desire and hope of finally succeeding, at least in some instances, "love endureth all things:" it influences a man to bear any poverty, reproach, persecution, hardship, suffering, or even death, in seeking to do good to the bodies and souls of men, after the example of Christ, and in obedience to his commandments. (Marg. Ref. y—a.) It is obvious to every attentive reader, that, in this beautiful description of the properties and effects of love, the apostle meant to show the Corinthians, that their conduct had, in most particulars, been an entire contrast to it. (Notes, Gal. 5:13—18. Jam. 3:13—18.)—He seems also, without intending it, to have delineated his own character, as a successful imitator of the Lord Jesus, the perfect pattern of this holy love. (Note, 11:1.) Love, as exercised by Christians, not the love of God to man, must be meant, and the admired accommodation of it to the latter by some eloquent writers, leads the reader away from the intended instruction of the passage, however excellent in other respects.

V. 8—12. The "love," which the apostle so warmly recommended, "never faileth:" it never loses its value or excellency; it will never be changed for any other thing; nor will it ever fail out of that heart, in which it has taken root: (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.) and especially it will endure for ever in heaven. But even "prophecy" would fail: the Spirit of prophecy would soon be withdrawn from the church; the instructions, given by the prophets from immediate revelation, would soon be superseded by more ordinary methods; and even the prophecies of the Scripture would all at length be accomplished, and, having answered their end, be of no further use. The gift of "tongues" was of no long continuance in the church; and in heaven no acquaintance with human languages will be of any value. That philosophical "knowledge," on which the Corinthians prided themselves, soon vanished as a dream: and even that kind and degree of religious knowledge, which is acquired on earth, will be eclipsed by the perfect knowledge of heaven, as the light of the stars by the blaze of noon; or the knowledge, by which some were qualified to teach others the truth and will of God, will at length be of no further use. Here indeed the servants of God "knew in part, and so prophesied in part:" they had a small portion of his ways, works, and counsels made known to them: but when the perfect discoveries of another world are made, all this is done away, as the useless taper in the daytime. (Marg. Ref. b—f.) This might be illustrated by the difference between the apprehensions of a child, and those of a man. The apostle himself could recollect, that when he was a child, he had talked in a childish and unsuitable manner about the affairs of men; and he had conceived of them, been affected by them, and reasoned about them, with much ignorance and misapprehension: but when he became a man, he not only put away his toys and childish pursuits, but his childish manner of speaking, thinking, and judging; as one ashamed of the impertinence and folly which had mixed with even the little knowledge that he had acquired. Thus on earth, he could conceive and speak only "as a child," about divine things, when his present knowledge was compared with that of heaven. (Marg. Ref. g.) Though preserved from all error in delivering the doctrine to mankind, by preaching or writing: he was aware, that he should find his views of them inadequate, unsuitable, and widely different from the real nature and glory of those sublime objects of contemplation. For he could here only see them "through a glass darkly;" as by the imperfect reflection of a mirror, or in the obscure description of a riddle. (Notes, Judg. 14:10—14. Ps. 49:1—4. Matt. 13:34,35.)—This view of them by faith, through revelation and by divine teaching is sufficient for the present state; but it is inadequate and obscure, compared with that view of them, which is obtained by those, who "see face to face;" and who have an immediate, intuitive, and complete perception of God, of Christ, and of heavenly things. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) So that even the apostle's "knowledge in part," of the truths and purposes of God, would be as nothing, when he came "to know, as he was known;" and to perceive those objects, with that clearness, fulness, and adequate conception of them, which corresponds to the perfect knowledge of God himself, as far as a finite mind can comprehend infinity. V. 13. Not only is "love" more excellent and more enduring, than all spiritual gifts, miraculous powers, and prophetical discoveries; but it even far exceeds in value all other Christian graces. After the ceasing of supernatural gifts in the church, "faith, hope, and love would abide," to the end of the world, as the three principal graces which distinguish Christians from all other men, and, in fact, as including all the others.—Faith cordially and practically receives the "sure testimony of God" concerning invisible things, appropriates his instruction, and thus welcomes his salvation, by looking to the divine Redeemer, and relying on him and the promises of God in him. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, John 3:27—36, vv. 35,36. Heb. 11:1,2. 1 John 5:9—12.) Hope, with longing and patient waiting, expects the promised blessings, as to be perfected in eternal life; and thus it is the "anchor of the soul," keeping it steadfast in obedience and patient waiting, amidst every kind of opposition and discouragement. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Heb. 6:16—20. 1 John 3:1—3.) And love to God, and to mankind for his sake, as before described, is the active principle of all those willing services, in which the Christian does good to others, according to the will of God. "These three abide," and must abide, as essential to godliness, under every dispensation, and in every age; whatever other changes take place: but "the greatest of these is love." (Marg. Ref. o, p.) Not that love can do the office of faith, in justifying the sinner, or do any thing towards it; any more than the eye can perform the function of the ear: nor can this "love" be found in any man, who is not partaker of faith and hope. But faith and hope are the means, or the intermediate acts of the mind, by which a proud, selfish, carnal, condemned criminal, is brought to love a reconciled God, and to love men in general, and Christians in particular, for his sake. They are as the scaffolding, without which the building cannot be erected: yet the building is more valuable than the scaffolding, and when that is completed, the other will be taken down as of no further use. For love is the very nature and image of God, "the bond of perfection," the essence of holiness, "the fulfilling of the law." Faith and hope are only requisite for us, as sinners, in this imperfect state: faith will therefore soon be lost in vision, and hope swallowed up in fruition; but perfect love will flourish for ever, the business, element, joy, and glory of heaven itself; uniting God and all holy creatures in the most perfect harmony and felicity, without the least alloy of any contrary principle, through all the ages of eternity. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. Splendid abilities, extensive learning, admired eloquence, and even exact "knowledge in the mysteries of God," may be possessed by a proud and selfish man; who is as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," in the most admired displays of his conspicuous endowments. Indeed, the powers or eloquence of angels, and all imaginable gifts of miracles or prophecy, cannot demonstrate a man to be at all better than Balaam or Judas: and even the most astonishing liberality or patient fortitude, under self-invented or imposed austerities, nay, persecution even to tortures and death, may spring from other motives and principles than holy love, and in that case will avail nothing before our heart-searching Judge. How then are they deluded, who expect acceptance and reward, for those good works, which are as scanty in their degree, as they are corrupt and selfish in their principle! And how are even true Christians often fascinated, to overrate ostentatious eloquence, gifts, and abilities, and to undervalue honest, simple, and unadorned love which seeks only to do them good! But where does this heavenly love reside, which the apostle so warmly panegyrizes? Is she returned to heaven, being wearied out with our contentions and selfishness on earth? Or does she dwell in some obscure retreat, at a distance from the disputes of the world, and of the church? Certainly she is but seldom seen among us; she has but few votaries and little influence; and is treated with strange neglect almost every where. Alas! numbers, who might be supposed "to be somewhat," if we only looked at their talents, knowledge, and zeal; appear to be "nothing," or very little, if "love" be the touchstone of their characters.—Indeed, this chapter may be considered as an answer to all the wrangling pamphlets of angry disputers about religious truth, of different names and sentiments. Many of these seem incapable of long-suffering or kindness to any but their own party: so that envy, boasting, railing, ridicule, slander, and acrimony, are the prominent features of the portrait, which they exhibit to the view of the public! In the most unseemly manner, they sound their own praises; vent their own resentments; expose and triumph over their opponents; forget all decent regard to superiors; and turn religious investigation into a vainglorious, selfish, if not scurrilous, contest for victory! It is evident, that many of this character are "easily provoked," and hardly pacified that they think evil of others, and rejoice in detecting the faults and follies of those who differ from them. In short, the attentive observer will perceive that every part of the apostle's definition of love forms a complete contrast to the conduct of great numbers, who, in different ages, have had numerous admirers, for their zeal and ability, in contending for the sentiments or forms of their own sect or party.—But alas! we need far more "love" than is generally possessed, to animadvert on such abuses, without being betrayed into a measure of imitation. Let us then rather inquire, whether this divine love inhabit and influence our hearts? Have we learned to suffer long and to be kind? Are we taught to repress envy and unholy emulation, and to rejoice in the superior reputation and success of our brethren? Has love instructed us "in honour to esteem others better than ourselves," and brought under all insolence, rashness, and ostentation? Has this divine principle guided us into a becoming behaviour to our superiors, equals, inferiors, opponents, competitors, friends, relatives, and all orders of men in the church or the community? Have we attained the habit of giving up our own interest or inclination, whenever the good of others requires it? Can we bear affronts, without being "easily provoked?" Are we disposed to be unsuspecting; to mourn over the sins of others; to bear with their infirmities, dulness, and perverseness: to "believe, hope, and endure all things" for their sakes? If some sparks of this heavenly flame have been kindled in our hearts; we know that there is much of a contrary nature, to counteract its efficacy. Here then is a call for watchfulness, diligence, and prayer; that our "love may abound yet more and more, in knowledge, and in all judgment;" and that our selfish nature may be more entirely subdued and mortified. (Notes, Phil. 1:9—11, v. 9. 1 Thes. 4:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3,4. 1 Pet. 1:22,23.) Hence we shal also see still more our need of the cleansing blood of Christ, and shall learn to walk humbly before God, and to bear with others; as conscious that we need the patient forbearance both of the Lord, and of our brethren.

V. 8—13. If love, as before described, is planted in our hearts, though as an exotic in an unfriendly soil and climate; it will "never fail," but certainly grow up to maturity: and it will flourish abundantly, when prophecies shall cease, when human science and eloquence shall vanish away; and when even our highest attainments in divine knowledge in this present world, (which are indeed very small compared with those of the apostle,) will appear like the lispings, the imaginations, and the reasonings of a little child.—But, if that feeble indistinct view which we obtain by faith, when looking in the mirror of the sacred word, be so delightful as we have sometimes found it; with what raptures shall we "see face to face," and "know even as we are known!" Let us then "put away the childish things," which amused us in an unconverted state; for so we now clearly see them to have been: let us learn to value things according to their intrinsic worth; and not, as children, admire all that glitters, whether it be gold or tinsel: let us cease from our childish pursuits about externals and non-essentials; that we may value and seek an increase of faith, hope, and love from the Giver of all good gifts: and while we contend, that "faith alone justifies" the sinner, by forming his relation to the Saviour; and that hope only can support the soul, amidst all the trials of life and death; let us remember, that love is still greater than these most needful graces, being the evidence of our title to eternal

CHAPTER XIV.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after love; and shows that prophecy, as most conducive to edification, is to be preferred to "speaking with tongues," 1—5. Speaking in a language, which the hearers do not understand, resembles indistinct musical sounds, and is of no use to the hearers, 6—11. All gifts should be used in the most edifying manner, 12—21. Tongues are intended to convince unbelievers; but prophesying is more useful in the public assembly, and to strangers who resort thither, 21—25. Rules for the orderly exercise of spiritual gifts in the church, 26—33. Women are so bidden to speak in public, 34, 35. A reproof of the self-sufficiency of some teachers at Corinth, 36—38. Gifts must be exercised, and all things done "decently and in order," 39, 40.

FOLLOW after [b]charity, [c]and desire spiritual gifts; but rather that ye may [d]prophesy.

2 For [e]he that speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man [f]understandeth him; [f]howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries.

3 But he that prophesieth speaking unto men, to [g]edification, and [h]exhortation, and [i]comfort.

4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue [k]edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth [k]edifieth the church.

5 I [m]would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: [n]for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, [o]except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying.

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, [p]what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by [q]revelation, or by [r]knowledge, or by [s]prophesying, or by [t]doctrine?

7 And even [u]things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, [x]except they give a distinction in the [y]sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

8 For [z]if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?

9 So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words [i]easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? [a]for ye shall speak into the air.

10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification.

11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, [a]I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me.

12 Even so ye, [b]forasmach as ye are zealous of [§]spiritual gifts, [c]seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. [Practical Observations.] life, the meetness for that holy and unspeakable felicity, and the blessed earnest and beginning of it.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. Having shown the pre-eminent excellency of "love," the apostle exhorted the Corinthians "to follow after" it, as the great object of their unremitting pursuit, in preference to all other things: and then they would do well, in "earnestly desiring spiritual gifts," that they might be useful to their brethren; for under the influence of "love," they would certainly thus use them. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) But especially they should value "the gift of prophesying." By this the apostle seems to have intended an immediate communication from the Spirit of God, concerning the meaning of the holy Scriptures, or some point of doctrine or practice, in which the church or individuals wanted instruction at the time. This was a gift bestowed on several, by which they became occasional or extraordinary teachers in the church: and it appears to have been generally accompanied by the power of predicting future events, when circumstances required it. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 20.) The Corinthians, however, did not value it so much as "the gift of tongues," or of miracles; because it was less suited to excite admiration: but the apostle instructed them, that it was greatly to be preferred by them, because more useful in their situation. For he who spake in a language, which the hearers could not understand, "did not speak to men, but unto God" only: nor would others receive any benefit, even if indeed, under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, he spake the most sublime mysteries of the gospel, in the most suitable words. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Note, Acts 2:6—11.) Whereas "he that prophesied" spake to men, to edify them in divine truth, to exhort them to holy practice, or to animate and comfort them under their trials and conflicts. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) Indeed, he who spake in an unknown tongue, might derive instruction and benefit from his own words, and his faith might be established by the exercise of this miraculous gift; in case he was not elated with pride, and influenced by ostentation. But he who prophesied would edify many, which was far more desirable. As the apostle rejoiced in every thing conducive to their prosperity, he desired that they might all be endued with the gift of tongues: but still more, that they might all be capable of instructing others, by the gift of prophesying. (Note, 12:4—11.) For the prophet was certainly a more honourable and useful person, than he who spake with tongues; except the latter were also endued with the gift of interpreting his discourse, into the language understood by his hearers: that so the church might be edified by what he spake. (Marg. Ref. m, o.) It seems that this was not generally the case: indeed a man might be miraculously enabled to speak in one, two, or more languages, which he had never learned: and yet, being left ignorant of other languages, he might be unable to explain his meaning to those, who neither understood the language in which he spake, nor that which was his native tongue. Or perhaps, to counterpoise a gift, which was so much calculated to elate the possessors, they might be left incapable of giving utterance, with propriety, perspicuity, or promptitude, suited to a public assembly, even in their native tongue, to those divine truths which they spake fluently in another language, under the influence of the Holy Spirit: and another man might be miraculously enabled to understand, and interpret into the language of the audience, what was thus spoken, who yet himself might be unable to speak fluently in the language which he interpreted. Even in ordinary cases, clearly understanding a language, and being able to speak fluently in it, are very distinct attainments.—'Why was the gift of tongues conferred? That the mysteries of God might be openly made known to more people and nations. Then surely, prophecy, to which the gift of tongues was intended to be subservient, must be of superior excellency.' Beza. 'This therefore was a great abuse of this gift, that when they had a mystery revealed to them, they did not utter it in a language understood by the assembly, but only by themselves: and so they did not edify the church by it, though it was given, as all the other gifts were, for edification. (12:7.) Whitby.—Follow after. (1) Pursue love. (Note, Heb. 12:14.) 'The word διωκετε properly signifies, to pursue with an eagerness, like that with which hunters follow their game. And it may be intended to intimate how hard it is to obtain, and preserve a truly benevolent spirit in the main series of life: considering on the one hand the many provocations we are like to meet with; and on the other, the force of self-love, which will, in so many instances, be ready to break in upon it.' Doddridge.

V. 6—12. To convince the Christians at Corinth, without giving them needless offence, of what he had advanced, the apostle put the case, that if, when he should come to see them, he should merely display his gift of speaking in a variety of languages; of what use would his visit be to them? Surely of none; except he spake intelligibly, either by immediate "revelation" from God, or from his superior "knowledge" in the mysteries of God; (Notes, Eph. 3:1—7.) or by some prophetical message suited to their case; or concerning some "doctrine" in which they wavered, or were mistaken. Unless in some of these ways, (which indeed it is difficult to distinguish with exactness,) he gave them clear instructions; all that he could say would be an unmeaning noise, even if the languages in which he spake were understood; much more if they did not understand them. (Marg. Ref. p—t.) For even "lifeless things," which are made use of to give sound, as, for instance, musical instruments, can give no direction to those who are to sing or dance to them, unless a proper distinction be observed in the sounds. And if the trumpet should be blown at random, without any distinction between that sound which calls the combatants to the field, and that which sounds a retreat, and other sounds of different meaning; what soldier could understand when to "prepare himself for the battle?" If then an intelligible distinction of sounds was necessary in the ordinary concerns of life, much more must they be so in those of religion. For unless the speakers uttered significant and intelligible words, how 13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, [d]pray that he may interpret.

14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, [e]my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

15 [f]What is it then? [g]I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, [h]and I will sing with the understanding also.

16 Else when thou shalt [i]bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the [k]unlearned say [l]Amen, at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?

17 For thou verily givest thanks well, [m]but the other is not edified.

18 I [n]thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all:

19 Yet [o]in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

20 Brethren, [p]be not children in understanding: howbeit [q]in malice be ye children, but in understanding be [r]men.

21 In [s]the law it is written, [t]With men of othe. tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord.

22 Wherefore tongues are [u]for a sign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, [v]but for them which believe.

23 If therefore [x]the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned or unbelievers, [y]will they not say that ye are mad?

24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, [z]he is convinced of all, he is judged of all:

25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so, [a]falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that [b]God is in you of a truth. [Practical Observations.] could the hearers understand what was spoken? They might as well speak in an empty room, or an unfrequented desert; where their words would be lost in the air, and never reach any human ear. (Marg. Ref. u—z.) There were indeed many languages, or dialects, according to the different regions of the earth: and each of these was significant to the persons accustomed to it. That circumstance therefore ought to be considered: otherwise, even in ordinary conversation, the speaker and hearer, who did not understand each other, would appear reciprocally barbarians to each other; however expressive, polite, and copious, the languages were in which they spake, and they would be more likely to despise one another, than to profit by the interview, or be satisfied with it. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, Acts 28:1,2.) In the common concerns of life, it was thus absolutely requisite for men to understand each other; and surely the Corinthians, amidst their zeal, and emulous desire of spiritual gifts, ought to act consistently with the common sense of mankind, and desire to excel in those things, by which they might edify the church; and not in such as could only procure to themselves irrational admiration!—'At this day, among the papists, they are used, in their sermons, always to quote the sacred Scriptures in Latin without adding a translation in the vulgar tongue; nor do they use any other method, in the singing and prayers.' Beza.—'If you, that have the gift of strange languages, do not speak . . . that which the auditors may understand: for to that end sure were those languages given, that you might speak to every one in his own language; (Acts 2:6.) how shall any one be better for your language?' Hammond.—It should be carefully noted, how decidedly the apostle prefers those gifts, and that exercise of gifts, which were suited to instruct and edify others; to those, which were more admired, but less suited to do substantial good.

V. 13—19. If any of the Corinthians would speak in an unknown tongue among their brethren, let them pray to be endued also with the gift of interpreting what was spoken, or what others delivered in a foreign language; that their religious exercises might not be a mere display of gifts without meaning or use. Supposing the apostle should come among them, and pray with the congregation in an unknown tongue; his spirit, or heart, might indeed be very devoutly engaged in the worship of God, while exercising this gift of the Holy Spirit: but, as others could not understand him, so, his own understanding would be unfruitful, having no just and proper exercise, and producing no benefit to his fellow-worshippers. What would then be the proper inference from this observation? Truly, he would pray from the fulness of spiritual affections; and in the sober exercise of his understanding also, by using such words as might edify others, and enable them to join with him. In like manner, when he sang the praises of God, he would endeavour to have his spiritual affections engaged as much as possible; yet he would also consider, as a rational man; what language would be best understood by the congregation. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) Now if any, neglecting this obvious dictate of discretion, should celebrate the praises of God, and return thanks for his mercies, in the most spiritual and fervent manner, but in an "unknown tongue;" how could he who occupied the place of a private believer, who had neither learning nor the gift of tongues, give his assent to the thanksgiving, by saying, Amen, as it was customary among them; (Marg. Ref. h—l.) seeing he had not understood any thing which was spoken? The one might give thanks in a very proper manner, but the other could derive no benefit from it.—Many indeed of the Corinthians supposed themselves to excel in this particular gift, and were pleased to make a show of it: but the apostle thanked God, that, as commissioned to preach to the Gentiles, of whatever nation, he "spake with tongues more than they all," and war enabled to preach in more languages; the whole praise of which he gave to the Lord. Yet he had rather "speak five words," or the shortest instructive sentence, among believers, in the public assembly, in a rational manner, so that others might understand him and be edified by what he said; than irrationally to speak ten thousand words, or the most copious discourse, "in an unknown tongue," which could be of no use to them.—Had the apostle lived about the era of the reformation, and written expressly against the church of Rome; he could not more emphatically have exposed the absurdity and wickedness of worshipping God, and performing all public services in Latin; of which the common people understand not one word. No wonder the rulers of that church lock up the Scriptures also in an unknown tongue, seeing they must otherwise bear too evident a testimony against them.—With the understanding. (15) That is, say most commentators, so as to be understood. This indeed is implied, and principally intended: yet an example of such an use of the words, cannot easily be adduced. But might not the apostle mean, that they, who spoke publicly in a language not understood by the auditors, however fervent their affections, or excellent their gifts might be, seemed to act like men without understanding, or who made no use of their understanding; seeing no man, however irrational and enthusiastical, could act more evidently against the plain dictates of sober reason and sound judgment?—Does not the apostle's argument, about prayer without any preconceived form, fully show, that if any one prayed or gave thanks, in a language understood by the congregation, the people might, if nothing else prevented, cordially say Amen to his words? And does not this remark sufficiently answer many common objections and arguments against prayer of this kind? It, however, by no means decides, whether that, or a liturgy, as to public worship, is most conducive to general edification, in the present state of the church.

and childish conduct of the Corinthians, who were evidently in no small degree disposed to self-wisdom, are well worthy of notice. (Note, 4:8.)—As they presumed, that they had superior knowledge, let them not be "children in understanding;" for it was as trifling and vain, to make a show of the gift of tongues, merely to astonish those who could not understand them; as any of the competitions and amusements of children could be. Let them indeed be as infants in respect of malice, and every evil disposition; being of a gentle forgiving disposition, without resentment or rancour: but let them be "men in understanding;" as matured in judgment and experience, and capable of acting with propriety and wisdom in all things. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, 13:8—12. Rom. 16:17—20.) In the law, or in the Old Testament, God had foretold, that he would speak to Israel "by men of other lips, and yet even then they would not hear him." This seems primarily to have related to the languages of those foreign nations, by whom God intended to execute vengeance on Israel: but it might also denote, that he would instruct them by persons endued with the gift of tongues, to convince them that the persons thus endued, taught the true religion, and were the servants of "the One living and true God." So that this gift, when exercised among such as did not understand what was spoken, was to be considered rather as a rebuke than as a favour: but in its proper use, it was intended for a sign to unbelievers, in order to their conversion; whereas, prophesying was more immediately intended for the edification of believers. (Marg. Ref. s, t.)—Yet the gift of tongues might be so perverted, as even to prove exceedingly injurious to unbelievers. If, for instance, the church at Corinth should be assembled in one place; and all who were able, should speak with tongues, several at once, and others in succession, while the rest did not understand what was spoken: and of any person, uninstructed in Christianity, or disposed to reject it, should come in to make observations; would not such irrational and confused proceedings confirm his prejudices, and cause him to conclude, that they were a company of madmen, or frantic enthusiasts? (Marg. Ref. y. Note, Acts 2:12,13.) But if they all prophesied, and one teacher after another, spake by the Spirit of God in a pertinent, instructive, and convincing manner, on some point of doctrine or practice; the stranger who occasionally came among them, would hear from every one, that which was suited to convince his understanding, to awaken his conscience, and to move his affections: he would find his secret objections answered, his secret thoughts divulged, his secret sins reproved, and the real state of his heart and soul made known to him, though before they had been unperceived. And this might be expected, by the divine blessing, to produce a full persuasion of the truth and excellency of the gospel: so that, it would often happen, that the curious or ignorant despiser would be suddenly changed into a humble worshipper; and that under his deep conviction, he would even prostrate himself in adoration of the living God: acknowledging that the glorious Lord was evidently present, in the midst of the assembled Christians; and evidently spake by them for the instruction of the hearers. V. 26—33. How then ought the public assemblies of Christians to be ordered and conducted? When they "came together," all who were endued with gifts eagerly seized the opportunity of exercising them: so that one would begin to sing a psalm or spiritual song; another to discourse on some doctrine; another to speak in an unknown tongue; another to declare some special revelation which had been made to him; and another to interpret what had been spoken. Thus several would speak at the same time, in different parts of the assembly: and while every one was more desirous to be heard and admired, than to hear and be edified, the whole scene became confused; and the great end of their coming together was overlooked. (Note, Jam. 1:19—21.)—As a general rule by which such abuses might be remedied, they ought always to take care, "that all things were done" with a view to the edification of those who were present. (Marg. Ref. d.) If then, any of them chose to "speak in an unknown tongue;" let no more than two, or at most three, one after another, exercise this gift at one time of assembling; and let some one interpret. But if none present were enabled to do this, let him, who was about "to speak in an unknown tongue," be silent: and be content to speak to himself and to God in meditation and prayer; without obtruding his unintelligible words upon the congregation, who might be more profitably employed. Let the prophets also speak by two or three at the same time of meeting, in due order; and let those prophets especially, who were silent, exercise their judgment upon what was spoken, to determine whether it accorded with the Scripture: as false prophets might creep in among them. (Marg Ref. e—g.) In case any thing should be immediately "revealed to" one who sat by, which required present attention: let the first, on a proper intimation given, "keep silence," till that had been considered: or, as some render it, let the other wait till the first had done speaking. For there was no reason, why any one should be eager to speak first; seeing by properly waiting, all who possessed that gift might prophesy, and all be edified. Nor could it be urged, that the divine impulse upon their minds constrained them to speak immediately, as the frantic heathen priests and priestesses did: for "the spirits of the prophets," (their minds when most powerfully influenced by the Holy Spirit,) were subject to government, and might be restrained, directed, and regulated, by reason and judgment, as at other times. That gracious God, whose Spirit spake by them, was by no means "the Author of confusion" and disorder, such as must ensue from the vehement utterance of many speakers at once, emulously seeking to attract most attention: but of peace harmony, mutual love, and good order; as it was evident in the conduct of "all the churches of the saints," in this and other particulars. (Marg. Ref. h—k.)—If there, &c. (28) It might happen that some person should speak in a tongue, not understood by the assembly; and, though able to interpret it into his own native tongue; neither he nor any present, could render what he had spoken into the language of the auditory; as distinct from both the language in which he spake, and from his native language.

V. 34, 35. (Note, 11:2—16.) To reconcile these verses with the scripture referred to, it seems most natural to suppose, that some of the Corinthian women were used to speak publicly, when not under any immediate or extraordinary impulse of the Holy Spirit; and perhaps they interrupted the other speakers, by inquiries or objections, according to the disputatious spirit which prevailed. The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a general rule, (to which the foregoing case was the only exception,) that women must not be allowed to speak in the public congregation, or to assume the office of teachers, or disputants; for this by no means consisted with that subjection to their husbands, which the law of God inculcated. But if they met with any thing in the public instructions, which they could not understand or assent to: let them wait till they went home, and then ask their husbands about it; who were supposed able and willing to inform them, and who were the most proper persons for them to confer with. (Notes, Gen. 3:16. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.) For it was inconsistent with modesty and propriety, and would be scandalous among their neighbours, for women to make a practice of discoursing in the public assemblies: which was contrary to the uniform custom, in the cities of Greece, and in other places. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 36—40. The abuses, here reproved, were peculiar to the church of Corinth; yet they counted themselves a model for other churches to imitate. Was then their's the mother church, from whom the preachers of the gospel had first come forth? or had the word of God reached them alone? (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Is. 2:2—5. Rom. 15:18—21. 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) As it was evident, that neither of these was the case; and as many churches had been planted before the church at Corinth; why did they presume to set themselves up above, or against, the wholesome regulations observed elsewhere? Indeed, some one at least of their ambitious teachers might be strenuous in supporting the innovations, which had been introduced; professing that he was "a prophet, or a spiritual man," 'that is, one well qualified, by religious instruction, to understand and judge about spiritual things; as opposed to "the carnal man," and "the babe in Christ." ' Beza. If he really were so, let him show it, by acknowledging the things, thus communicated, to be the commandments of Christ by his apostle. But if any man was, or professed to be, ignorant of his apostolical authority, and of the obligation of these instructions; let him continue ignorant, for it would answer no purpose to enter into any further debate with him. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Matt. 7:6. 15:12—14. 2 Thes. 3:14,15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5.)—Upon the whole, therefore, the apostle exhorted them to "covet to prophecy," in preference to all other spiritual gifts, yet not to forbid speaking with tongues: but let all things relative to their public assemblies, be regulated with a strict regard to decorum, propriety, and regularity: as this must tend very much to their own edification, and the credit of the gospel among unbelievers; as well as be most honourable and acceptable to God. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—To adduce this text, as a direct argument about any particular external ceremonies, used in divine worship, (which always appear decent and orderly to those who invent, impose, or are attached to them, and the contrary to those who dissent from them,) is doubtless wresting it from its proper meaning.—(Note, Col. 2:5—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. All our pursuits should spring from "love," as the grand motive; and this we ought to follow after, without wearying, though it seem continually to flee from us.—Every endowment or possession is valuable in proportion as it is useful; and all public ordinances should be conducted in that manner, which most conduces to the edification, exhortation, animation to duty, and consolation under afflictions, of believers: and to the conversion of sinners. Even fervent spiritual affections must be governed by the sober exercise of the understanding: or else, with the best intentions, men will run into great extravagances, and disgrace the truth which they mean to promote.—What shall I profit others? or, in what respect shall I be profited? are proper inquiries, when we are considering, in what manner to conduct our assembling together for religious duties, and even our social meetings. Ministers, especially, should not only study to exercise their gifts, with acceptance and reputation; but inquire in the first place, what peculiar advantage their hearers may derive from the subjects which they select, and their manner of explaining and enforcing them. Alas! for want of this, many a good speaker in delivering an eloquent and admired discourse, is even more unmeaning than "things without life giving sound;" and if they, who play on musical instruments, made no more exact distinction in their sounds, than many preachers do in their doctrine and exhortation; and in suiting their subjects, and their addresses to the cases and characters of their hearers: they would be unfit even to direct the motions of dancers much more to call the soldier to arm for the battle.

V. 13—25. While we most reasonably exclaim against prayers and worship, in an unknown tongue; and thank God for emancipating us from so absurd an imposition: we should inquire, whether some, who speak in the language of their native country, do not so affect elegant phrases, sonorous words, or words adopted from other languages, and learned discussions; as to render themselves unintelligible to the common people; and whether this be not quite as irrational, as preaching to Britons in Greek or Latin would be. This alas! is sometimes, in a measure, the case with preachers, whose doctrine is worthy of attention; for obscurity is the best qualification of many public teachers! If we use language in any respect above the capacities of our most illiterate and weakest hearers, to please a few who are more learned and polite; how shall they, who most need instruction, know what is spoken? Indeed, it might as well be spoken to the air. But if we speak in plain, simple, and perspicuous language, which even children may understand, (and this does not imply coarseness and vulgarity,) we may be sure, that the more intelligent part of our audience will be edified, if disposed to receive instruction. And surely, a minister of Christ should more desire to "excel, for the edifying of the church;" than in order to obtain the character of a polite, correct, eloquent, or learned speaker! Whatever judgment others may form; all who are actuated by the love and zeal of the apostle, will choose to speak "five words so as to be understood, rather than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue:" and will wave the display of the natural or acquired abilities, when possessed from the same motive as the apostle did his gift of divers tongues. (Notes, 2:1—5.)—Whether we pour out our prayers, sing the praises of God, or thank him for his mercies; we should be careful to unite spiritual affections with sober judgment: and they, who lead in social worship, should use such language as may affect and instruct the meanest fellow-worshipper, and enable him to add his cordial "Amen" to what is spoken.—We should indeed be as children in respect of malice and revenge; and a child-like docility, simplicity, dependence, and submission greatly become us: but childish deviations from the dictates of good sense and sober reason, are unbecoming the disciples of Christ; who should endeavour to attain a ripeness in wisdom and understanding, and to "walk wisely towards them that are without." (Notes, Matt. 10:16—18, v. 16. Eph. 5:15—20. Col. 4:5,6.) Though the conducting of public worship ought to be peculiarly directed to the edification of believers, and of the congregation: yet provision should also be made for those unbelievers, or curious strangers, who may come among us even as spies to make remarks; nor should any thing be admitted which may reasonably excite their disgust, or needlessly confirm their prejudices. They are ready enough to conclude, that we are enthusiastic, or "mad," without our giving them any ground for the charge: and the more willing we are to bear contempt and reproach, when unmerited, the more careful should we be not to deserve them. This has not been in any measure sufficiently attended to; and many things have been said and done, without warrant from Scripture, nay, contrary to its plain import, and the gravity and discretion which it inculcates: and this even by good men, who have sent away occasional hearers riveted in their prejudices against the truth, and disposed to ridicule it in every company; so that the mischief thus done, is incalculable. But when the word of God is soberly spoken, with an address both to the understanding and the affections, and with an authoritative application to the conscience, occasional hearers are often unexpectedly impressed; being judged, convinced, and arraigned by what they hear. The very "secrets of their hearts" seem to be disclosed by the experimental address of the preacher; and they are induced to join in that worship, which they before despised; and to confess that "God is of a truth among" those persons, whom perhaps they came prepared to deride. (Note, Tit. 2:7,8.)

V. 26—40. In all things edification should be aimed at: ambition, emulation, and self-preference should be steadily repressed: men should be "swift to hear and slow to speak;" more ready to receive than forward to give instruction; and willing, (unless the case require the contrary,) to "speak to themselves and to God," leaving others to edify the congregation to better advantage. When professors of evangelical doctrine, who imagine themselves qualified and called to be teachers, are so full of their subject, that they cannot refrain from speaking, however unadvised or irregular their conduct may be; it is evident that they are more influenced by self-sufficiency and ambition, or by enthusiastic impressions, than by humble zeal and love. For the Spirit of God moves the will and affections, in a manner consistent with the exercise of sober reason and discretion. "Even the spirits of the prophets were subject to the prophets;" and doubtless this must be, at least equally the case with inferior teachers. For "God is the author of peace and good order, not of confu-

CHAPTER XV.

The apostle states that gospel, which he had preached at Corinth, and shows how fully the resurrection of Christ had been demonstrated, 1—11. He proves, that the resurrection of the dead is inseparable from that of Christ; and that the denial of it is subversive of Christianity, and of all the hopes of Christians, 12—19: but "Christ, the First-fruits," being risen, all others shall arise in due order; till death, the last enemy being subdued, the kingdom shall be delivered up to the Father, 20—28: otherwise it would be in vain for any to risk their lives, as the apostle did, 29—32. He warns and reproves the Corinthians, refutes objections, and illustrates his doctrine. 33—41; shows some things relating to the general resurrection; contrasts the first and the second Adam, and shows the change which will be wrought both in the dead, and those who shall at that time be found living, 42—53. As death will at length be thus swallowed up in victory; he triumphs in hope over death and the grave, through Christ, 54—57; and concludes with an animated exhortation, to steady and persevering diligence, in the work of the Lord, 58.

MOREOVER, brethren, [a]I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, [b]which also ye have received, and wherein [c]ye stand;

2 By which also [d]ye are saved, if ye [e]keep in memory [f]what I preached unto you, [g]unless ye have believed in vain:

3 For [f]I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that [g]Christ died for our sins [h]according to the Scriptures;

4 And [i]that he was [j]buried, and that [k]he rose again the third day [l]according to the Scriptures;

5 And [m]that he was seen of [n]Cephas, [o]then of the twelve;

6 After that, [p]he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some [q]are fallen asleep.

7 After that, he [r]was seen of James, [s]then of all the apostles.

8 And last of all [t]he was seen of me also, as of [u]one born out of due time.

9 For I am [v]the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, [w]because I persecuted the church of God.

10 But [x]by the grace of God I am what I am; [y]and his grace which was bestowed upon me, was not in vain; [z]but I laboured more abundantly than they all: [a]yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.

11 Therefore, [b]whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed. [Practical Observations]

sion:" and he never teaches men to neglect their relative duties, to act in a manner, which is unbecoming their age and station, or inconsistent with decency and propriety. Indeed, restrictions of this kind are not regarded by many, who think themselves immediately influenced by the Spirit of God, and more spiritual and zealous than their brethren: yet it behooves them to show, that they are so, by acknowledging these regulations of the apostle to be the commandments of Christ, and excellently suited to render the worship and conduct of his people respectable before men, and honourable to him. Whereas, deviations from them often lead to those things which are indeed shameful; and suited to prejudice men's minds against the gospel: as if it dissolved relative obligations, put an end to all regular subordination; and taught even women to act inconsistently with that modesty, which is their peculiar ornament and honour. But if men will remain ignorant of such things, after proper instruction and warning, it is not advisible to be always debating with them: we must leave them, "take heed to ourselves," and seek other opportunities of usefulness.—However valuable miraculous gifts were in the primitive church; we cannot well read this epistle without cheerfully acquiescing in the will of God, as to his withholding them from us. Man's heart is so prone to pride, ostentation, and folly; that even endowments, of this kind, were made occasions of grievous sins and offences! Our vain glory is sufficiently excited by inferior and ordinary gifts or abilities; and this often militates greatly against our usefulness and peace; and requires many painful and distressing remedies, to prevent its more fatal effects. (Notes and P. O. 2 Cor. 12:1—10.) Let us then be contented with our present means and methods of instruction; let us endeavour to "do all things decorously and in order;" and above all desire that grace which sanctifies and humbles the soul, and so prepares it for heavenly felicity.

NOTES.—CHAP. XV. V. 1, 2. The apostle here entered on another subject. The Corinthians were tinctured with the Sadducean spirit of Jewish skeptics; or rather with the philosophizing temper of the Grecians, who derided the doctrine, and denied the possibility, of a resurrection: some of them also maintaining that virtue was its own reward, and that the expectation of a future recompense was a mean unworthy motive. So that, certain persons at Corinth began to teach, that there would be no resurrection; allegorizing, or explaining away, what had been revealed, or declared, to them on that subject. (Note, 2 Tim. 2:14—18.) It does not however appear that they denied the immortality of the soul. —In order to stop the progress of so pernicious an error, the apostle began, by stating the substance of the doctrine which he had taught them; which they had received by faith, as a divine testimony, in which he supposed them still to be steadfast; and by which they "were saved," and would certainly be finally saved, in case they remembered and cleaved to what he had delivered to them: this they would do, unless they had believed, with a vain, empty, and inefficient faith, in which case they might be left to embrace tenets subversive of the whole doctrine of Christ. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 12—18. 11:17—22. Matt. 13:20,21. Jam. 2:19,20.)

V. 3—11. In the first place, and as a matter of the greatest importance, the apostle had delivered to the Christians at Corinth, as also to other churches, even as he had received it of the Lord Jesus: (Notes, 11:23—28. Is. 21:10. Acts 20:18—27.) that he, the Messiah, the Son of God, had died, a spotless sacrifice of infinite value, for the sins of mankind, as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world," in order, "that all who believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and this agreed with the types, prophecies, and promises of the Scriptures: (Marg. Ref. g, h.) That, being really dead, Pilate had delivered his body to Joseph of Arimathea, to be buried; and that on the third day he arose again, as it had been foretold. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, Matt. 12:38—40. Acts 2:25—32.) To demonstrate his resurrection, on which the whole of Christianity rested, he first appeared to Peter; (Note, Luke 24:32—35.) then in the evening of that day, to those of the twelve apostles who were assembled; and on the evening of the succeeding first day of the week, when Thomas was present and confessed him, as "his Lord and God:" (Notes, John 20:19—29.) that afterwards he appeared to above five hundred disciples at once doubtless in Galilee, where he was most known, where many of his disciples lived, and where he had appointed to meet the apostles. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, Matt. 28:16,17.) Much the greatest part of these had been still preserved, to be living witnesses of that great event; though "some had fallen asleep," having died in faith and hope, and so departed to be present with their Lord. (Marg. Ref. q.) Afterwards James was favoured with a visit from his risen Saviour. Probably this was James the son of Alpheus who wrote the epistle; but we have no other account of this appearance of Christ. Then he was seen of all the apostles, before and at his ascension: (Notes, Matt. 28:16—20. Mark 16:14—20. Luke 24:36—53. Acts 1:1—8. 10:36—43.) and last of all he had graciously manifested himself to Paul also, in such a manner, that he could not but assuredly know him to be Jesus, who had been crucified. (Notes, Acts 9:1—30.) In this, the Lord had acted with peculiar condescension and mercy; because he, Paul, was so base and worthless, that he was more properly to be deemed "an untimely birth," or an abortion, than in any way entitled to such distinguished favour. (Marg. Ref. s—u.)—'Suetonius says, that there were, in the time of Augustus, an enormous number of senators, . . . and most of them most unworthy of that dignity, having, after the death of Cesar, by favour and bribery gotten to be elected. These the multitude proverbially styled abortives. St. Paul, like them, was none of the regular number of the twelve, first taken in, in Christ's lifetime, . . . no way worthy to be an apostle; . . . and yet, by Christ's grace and special favour, called and admitted to this dignity.' Hammond. In this respect he considered himself, as "the least of the apostles," and unworthy to be numbered among them, (though in endowments and authority he was "not a whit behind the chiefest of them,") (Note, 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) because he had, so wickedly and cruelly, persecuted the church of God. (Notes, 1 Tim. 1:12—16.) By the rich mercy and powerful grace of God he was, however, at length brought to be a Christian and an apostle, and to be employed in many, and those most important services. Nor was this distinguishing favour shown him in vain; seeing he had been constrained by the love of Christ and of souls to labour "more abundantly," than any even of the other apostles. Yet this was 12 ¶ Now [c]if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, [d]how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13 But [e]if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen.

14 And if Christ be not risen, [f]then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found [g]false witnesses of God; because [h]we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: [i]whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised;

17 And if Christ be not raised, [k]your faith is vain; [l]ye are yet in your sins.

18 Then they also which are [m]fallen asleep in Christ are perished.

19 If in [n]this life only we have [o]hope in Christ, we are [p]of all men most miserable.

[Practical Observations.]

20 ¶ But [q]now is Christ risen from the dead, and become [r]the First-fruits of them that slept.

21 For since [s]by man came death, [t]by man came also the resurrection of the dead.

22 For as [u]in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

23 But [x]every man in his own order: Christ the First-fruits; afterward [y]they that are Christ's at his coming.

24 Then [z]cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up [a]the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power.

25 For [b]he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet.

26 The [c]last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.

27 For [d]he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, All things are put under him, not to be ascribed to him, or to any thing in his natural disposition more towardly than others; but wholly to "the grace of God that was with him," which both wrought the willing mind, and gave him the ability thus to "abound in the work of the Lord." (Marg. Ref. x—a. Notes, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12. Phil. 2:12,13. Col. 1:28,29.) As therefore all the apostles had been witnesses of Christ's resurrection, so both they and he had every where preached the same doctrines. These were then to be considered as the grand peculiarities of Christianity, which could not be denied without virtually attempting to subvert the whole system.—Several other appearances of Christ after his resurrection have been considered as recorded by the evangelists; but this account mentions circumstances not before stated, and illustrates that important subject.

V. 12—18. All the apostles preached the resurrection of Christ, as an undoubted fact, a fundamental doctrine, and the great demonstration of the truth of the gospel. How then was it, that some Corinthians ventured to declare, that "no resurrection of the dead" was to be expected? Probably they argued against the possibility or credibility of such an event; and then endeavoured to put a figurative construction on the testimony of apostles or prophets concerning it. This however, amounted to a denial of Christ's resurrection: for that authenticated fact demonstrated the possibility of the dead being raised; it confirmed all that he had taught about that doctrine; and it was an earnest of the resurrection of all believers: so that, to invalidate the resurrection of Jesus, would subvert Christianity itself. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, 20—28. John 5:28,29. 11:20—27.) For this was the grand proof that he was the Messiah: it attested the acceptance of his atonement; and it made way for his ascension, intercession, and mediatorial kingdom. (Notes, Rom. 4:23—25. 8:32—34.) The whole therefore of the doctrine, taught by the apostles, was so inseparably connected with "the resurrection of Christ;" that if this could be disproved, their preaching would be evinced to be useless and delusory, and the faith of their hearers groundless and unprofitable. Yea, they would be convicted of bearing false witness in this sacred cause, as if God had needed such base frauds to support religion in the world! which in some respects was "bearing false witness against him." (Marg. Ref. g—h. Note, Job 13:7—12.) And, notwithstanding all the miracles wrought by them, with their self-denying labours, holy lives, and patient sufferings unto death, it would be proved, that they had combined together to deceive mankind with a most egregious falsehood! (Note, 2 Pet. 1: 16—18.) For the general proposition, "that there is no resurrection," included in it that particular one, "Christ is not risen:" as the resurrection of others could only need a continuation of that same omnipotent exertion, which raised him from the grave. But if Christ were not risen, "their faith was vain," and "they were yet in their sins:" for no repentance or reformation could possibly take away their guilt; and nothing could prove that Christ's atonement had been accepted, except his resurrection from the dead. Nay, further, they who had died in the faith, and fallen asleep in Jesus, whether by a natural death, or as martyrs, had certainly perished in their sins, if Christ was not risen: for, whatever might be urged on other grounds, for the immortality of the soul, there could be no other way of forgiveness, acceptance, and eternal life, than through the efficacy of his atoning sacrifice, the belief of which could not consist with the denial of his resurrection. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—As the persons spoken of had actually repented, renounced sin, and "walked in newness of life;" they could not "perish in their sins," except through the want of a sacrifice sufficient to expiate their guilt: and thus the apostle's argument, concerning our Lord's resurrection, demonstrates that he, and the primitive church, universally regarded the doctrine of the real Atonement of Christ's death, as essential to Christianity.—'If Christ be not risen for our justification, we are yet under the guilt of sin: and if so, both body and soul must perish after death; and then the hope of Christians must terminate with this life.' Whitby.

V. 19. If the consolations, derived from the hope and earnests of another life, were to be thus torn from Christians, and they had no other benefit from Christ than what related to this present life, they would be "of all men most miserable." Some explain this wholly of the apostles, as exposed to peculiar hardships and sufferings; and as peculiarly guilty in propagating an imposture, if indeed Christ was not risen: but there seems no proof that this restriction was intended. It does not follow, that Christians would in fact be more unhappy than other men, if there should in the event, be no future reward; for even then, their hopes of heaven, and that consolation which is thence derived, would far more than counterbalance their peculiar trials, self-denials, and hardships: but if this hope and consolation were taken from them; they would indeed be more miserable than other men: having lost their relish for those vain pleasures, which alone could be hoped for, and in which other men with a measure of success, strive to forget their misery; experiencing earnest desires, which must certainly be disappointed; and enduring many peculiar evils, without any peculiar support and consolation.—The fact however is, that Christians have not only the hope of a future felicity, but also the earnests, the beginnings, and first-fruits of it, in those holy affections towards God, and that "joy" in him "which a stranger intermeddleth not with;" and therefore they are so far from being "of all men most miserable;" that they of all men enjoy the most solid comfort, amidst their difficulties and trials, and even in the seasons of the sharpest persecutions. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 1:1—7, vv. 3—6. 6:3—10.)—Many of the Corinthians were not aware, what dangerous inferences were fairly deducible from the tenets, to which they had listened; and their false teachers would doubtless disavow them: yet it was proper thus to expose them; that they might be put upon their guard, and not patronize opinions pregnant with such mischief to the souls of men, and so destructive of the animating hopes and comforts of all believers.

tized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?

glorious change which shall take place in the bodies of the saints; and finally he triumphs over death by the consideration of a resurrection and a glorious immortality. This is the plan, or method, and the coherence of the parts, in this noble chapter.—In opposition to the errors above noticed, the apostle "testified," with authority, as fully instructed by immediate revelation, that "Christ is risen from the dead, and become the First-fruits of those who slept" in death; even of all believers who had died from the beginning, and of all who should die to the end of the world. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 3—11,50—54. Dan. 12:2,3. Matt. 27:51—53. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) He was the first who arose to die no more; and the most illustrious of all, who ever shall die and arise. He arose as a public Person, as the Surety, the Representative, and the Forerunner, of his saints: his resurrection was a pledge and assurance of theirs; and as "the first-fruits," presented to God, to sanctify and secure his blessing upon the whole harvest. (Notes, Lev. 23:10—14. Col. 1:18—20. Jam. 1:16—18.) "For since by man" sin and death entered into the world; so, "by Man," by One in human nature, "came the resurrection of the dead:" and, as in consequence of their relation to Adam, all men are born mortal, and at length die; even so, in and by Christ, shall all be made alive. (Notes, John 11:20—27, vv. 26,27. Rom. 5:12—19.) All men, without exception, through his undertaking being placed under a dispensation of mercy, shall be raised from the dead, that their future state may be accordingly determined: yet none will be finally benefited, except those, who are one with him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit; and of these the apostle particularly, and almost exclusively, treats in this chapter. (Note, John 5:28,29.)—This resurrection was appointed to take place in due order: Christ himself "the First-fruits:" hereafter, at his coming, his redeemed people will be raised before others; and at last the wicked will arise also. Then "the end" of this present state of things will arrive: and, the solemnities of the final judgment being concluded, Christ will deliver up the mediatorial "kingdom to God, even to the Father" from whom he received it; having previously "put down all rule, and all authority, and power," which have been placed in opposition to his cause and kingdom. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) For "he must reign, till all enemies" be subjected to him; as it had been predicted concerning him, and the Scripture cannot "be broken." (Marg. Ref. b. Note, Ps. 110:1.) Of these enemies, "death" will be the last which will be put under the Redeemer's feet; when he has finally delivered all his people from this universal conqueror, and entirely abolished him. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 2 Tim. 1:10. Heb. 2:14,15.) For when it is said, that JEHOVAH has put all things under the feet of Christ; it is evidently meant of all creatures, and with an exception of the great Creator, "who put all things under him." Thus, "when all things shall be subdued" to the incarnate Son, and when the end of his mediatorial authority shall be thus completely answered; "then shall the Son himself," as Man and Mediator, be "subject unto Him, who hath put all things under him:" all the power and authority will be acknowledged to have been of God, and all the honour will be referred to him; his absolute kingdom shall then supercede the Mediatorial kingdom of Christ; that God may be acknowledged and glorified, as "all in all;" the first great Cause, and the last End, in every thing, and the Object of universal adoration and obedience. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Note, Phil. 2:9—11.)—The distinction between the absolute, universal, and everlasting kingdom of God, the Governor of all, and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, as instituted for the benefit of fallen man, is every where implied in Scripture. The Father, as the Head of the absolute kingdom, ceased not to reign, when the Son was advanced to the mediatorial throne: as that authority was intended to endure only for a season, in order to accomplish certain important ends, to the glory of God in man's salvation. (Notes, Matt. 28:19. John 5:20—30.) After the day of judgment, this kingdom will be terminated: Christ, having executed his commission, will cease to reign "over all worlds," as Mediator, having publicly "delivered up the kingdom to God" in the person of "the Father:" yet he will in human nature retain a peculiar authority over his redeemed people; and, as One with the Father, he will, with him and the Holy Spirit, reign One "God over all, blessed for evermore:" nor will he any more cease to reign in this sense, when he has given up the mediatorial kingdom, than the Father ceased to reign, when he appointed the Son to that kingdom. For in this passage, as in some others, the Person of the Father is mentioned, as filling the throne and appointing the Mediator; in order to distinguish the absolute authority of God, from the delegated authority of the Son in human nature.—'He saith not that "the Father," mentioned in the twenty-fourth verse, but that "God may be all in all:" and so he seems to lead us to that interpretation of the Godhead, which comprehends Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: That the Godhead may govern all things immediately by himself, without the intervention of a Mediator between him and us, to exact our obedience in his name, and to convey to us his favours and rewards. ... So that as now Christ, Theanthropos, God-man, is "all in all;" (Col. 3:11.) because the Father hath put all things into his hands, does all things, and governs all things, by him; when this economy ceases, the Godhead will be "all in all," as governing and influencing all things by himself immediately. "That God may be all in all,"... by a full communication of himself to, and an intimate union with, all his saints. ... Though it' (the kingdom of Christ,) 'shall have no such end as the preceding monarchies had (Luke 1:32,33.) by giving place to a succeeding kingdom; (Dan. 7:14.) but shall be an eternal kingdom in the same sense, in which he is a Priest for ever:" ... (Heb. 7:17,24,25.) yet as that priesthood must needs cease, when the subject of it ceaseth, and he hath none to intercede for: so must his kingly office cease, when all his friends have that eternal life conferred upon them, for which this power was committed to him, and all his "enemies are become his footstool." ... Though the Godhead could alone enable him to execute his kingly office; yet was he thus exalted, this power and judgment were conferred on him, "because he was the Son of man." (John 5:27.) He interceded still in heaven, by virtue of his blood; all favours are granted to the church through him, and God will judge the world "by the man Christ Jesus." ... While he continued on earth, and acted only as a Prophet sent from God; he always owned that he could "do nothing of himself, but as the Father gave him commandment, so he did, and so he spake." (John 5:30. 8:38. 12:49.)—But being exalted to be Lord of all things, he acted as Lord in all things, which relate to his kingly office over his church. ... The exercise of this authority he shall then lay down, when "all things are subdued to him;" no other kingdom or dominion being to be exercised in the celestial state, but what is essential to the whole Godhead. And though he shall ever so far reign, as to be still at the right hand of God, in honour, dignity, and beatitude; ... and though the effects of his kingly power shall continue for ever, His enemies being destroyed, and his saints reigning in bliss for ever; yet the exercise of that kingly power shall then cease, and he, as Man, shall be subject to the Father .... As Christ before was "all in all," in reference to his church, and "from his fulness they did all receive;" so now the Godhead may be all in all, and fill all things immediately by himself.' Whithy.—No doubt, Christ, as Man, and in his mediatorial kingdom, always was most perfectly subject to the Godhead, referring all to his honour, and exercising all his authority, "to the glory of God the Father:" but when the grand designs of that kingdom shall be illustriously completed, in the view of all holy creatures in the universe, and the kingdom delivered up; this shall appear in the most conspicuous manner, and so as far to exceed all our conceptions: and the glory of the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, will be displayed and adored, in the highest possible degree. 'The resurrection of all that "are Christ's," is to be at this very advent: but how can he "deliver up his kingdom" and yet reign on earth a thousand years? In a word, if all that are his must be raised at his coming to the final judgment, then none before that coming; and then they must be all raised together, not some a thousand years before the rest" Whithy. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.)—He hath put, &c. (27) Both in the LXX. and the Hebrew the verb is in the second person, "Thou hast put, &c." (Ps. 8:6. Notes, Ps. 8:4—9. Heb. 2:5—13.)

V. 29, 30. The apostle having shown the order and event of the general resurrection, proceeds to evince still further the importance of a firm belief respecting it.—The expression "baptized for the dead," has given occasion to a variety of ingenious conjectures and learned discussions. Some argue that is only means, 'baptized in the name of one who certainly died,' and who, "if the dead rise not," 'still remains among the dead.' But the word rendered "dead" is plural, and all the labour bestowed to remove that difficulty is to no purpose. Others suppose, that the apostle refers to a practice, which, it seems, at one time prevailed in the church, of baptizing a living person in the stead, and for the supposed benefit, of one who had died unbaptized. But who can imagine, that so absurd and gross a superstition was customary, when the apostle wrote? Or that, if it were, he should sanction it?—Beza, rather triumphantly, concludes that he has discovered and fixed the true interpretation; and that the apostle meant the washing of the dead bodies, among the Jews and Christians, before burial; (Acts 9:37.) which he thinks was a profession that they expected a resurrection. But the use of the word baptize, in such a connexion, could hardly be expected; and the words will not bear that sense, by any fair interpretation.—Hammond contends, that it means the profession of faith, concerning the resurrection of the dead, which was required of persons at their baptism, which represented, as he thinks, the burial and resurrection of Christ. 'Why did they profess this, if they did not believe it?' But this is far from satisfactory: for the peculiar circumstances of some persons, when they were baptized, seem evidently intended.—'What this baptizing for the dead was, I confess I know not; but it seems by the following verses, to be something, wherein they exposed themselves to the danger of death.' Locke.—The following interpretation, however, suggested by Dr. Doddridge, who received it from Sir Richard Ellis, appears the true one. The apostle refers to the case of those, who presented themselves for baptism, immediately after the martyrdom of their brethren, or at their funerals; as if fresh soldiers should enlist and press forward to the assault, to supply the places of those who had fallen in battle. Thus they professed their faith in Christ, and ventured the rage of their enemies, at the very time when others had been put to death for the gospel. But what advantage could they propose to themselves from such a conduct, if there were no resurrection? Or what wisdom could there be in so doing? For in this case, Christianity itself would lose the great evidence of its truth; even the immortality of the soul might be called in question; believers were yet "in their sins;" and they who died as martyrs had lost their souls, as well as their lives. This might show the Corinthian speculators how greatly their notions tended to discourage men from professing the gospel in times of persecution, and to make them afraid and ashamed to own the cause of Christ. If this were the case, why did Christians in general, or the apostles and evangelists in particular, live in continual and imminent danger of suffering and death, by their open profession of the gospel, and their zeal in promoting it? They could have no sufficient encouragement for so doing, if the dead should never arise. (Marg. Ref. i.)

For the dead (29) Ὑπερ των νεκρων, super mortuos.—Stand we in jeopardy. (30) Κινδυνευομεν. Luke 8:23. Acts 19:27,40.

V. 31—34. The apostle protested, in the most solemn manner, "by their rejoicing," or his rejoicing with them, and on their account, as converted by his ministry, (several copies read it "our rejoicing,") that he "died daily:" he was every day exposed to the peril of martyrdom; he expected that violent death continually; and his manifold hardships and sufferings rendered his life a kind of lingering execution. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k, l.) To all this he had nothing to oppose, except the joyful hope and blessed earnests of future felicity through his crucified and risen Lord, and the pleasure of bringing others to share the same "salvation with eternal glory:" yet this, upon the principles which he was confuting, must prove a mere delusion. What profit then could he derive from his late perils at Ephesus, "if the dead should not arise?" he had there, "after the manner of men, fought with wild beasts." It is not in the least probable, that the apostle literally fought with wild beasts in the public shows; such an event could scarcely have been passed over unnoticed by Luke, in "the Acts of the Apostles;" being a Roman citizen, it cannot be supposed, that he would be exposed to such an indignity; and the expression "after the manner of men," establishes the figurative interpretation. Indeed the irrational fury of his enraged enemies, with the extreme danger to which he had been exposed, might very properly be represented as a contest with savage beasts of prey.—Many expositors have supposed, that the apostle referred to the tumult at Ephesus, excited by Demetrius and his workmen; (Notes, Acts 19:23—41.) but he afterwards in this epistle, expresses his purpose of continuing at Ephesus till Pentecost; (16:8.) whereas in the history it is said, that "after the uproar ceased, he ..., departed to go into Macedonia." (Acts 20:1.) Indeed, his whole plan seems to have been deranged in good measure by that tumult. (Notes, 16:5—9. 2 Cor. 1: 15—20.) Had he, in this short and figurative expression, alluded to that event, in writing to the Corinthians; it must have been as supposing them previously acquainted with it. It is evident, that he wrote from Ephesus, and that he intended to remain there for some time longer. The epistle must therefore have been written before that tumult; and some other of his many hardships at Ephesus must be meant. He had great success and many adversaries in that city: and it is plain, that only a small part of his sufferings have been particularly recorded. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:21—31.)—'If this sense' (the literal interpretation,) 'be not liked, you may interpret "after the manner of men," according to the intention of men, it being the intention of the men of Asia to deal so with him. Note also, that cruel and bloody-minded men are often represented under this metaphor of beasts. So Ignatius, when he was carried from Syria to Rome, under a band of soldiers, who, saith he, are the worse for the kindness I show them, 'From Syria to Rome I fight with beasts. And Heraclitus ... says, 'The Ephesians were turned into beasts, because they slew one another.'' Whitby.—The apostle's conduct however, in steadfastly persevering to profess and preach the gospel, abundantly demonstrated that he most firmly believed a future resurrection, with which all his hopes and comforts were inseparably connected. Whereas, the epicurean maxim, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" let us indulge every sense and appetite, without restraint, and shrink from all hardship as much as possible, for death will soon terminate our pleasures, and nothing further is to be expected; this would be the natural inference from a denial of that doctrine, when carried to its unavoidable consequences. (Marg. Ref. m—p.)—Let none then be deceived, by the specious reasonings and pretenses of their false teachers: for even a heathen poet (Menander,) could teach them, that "evil communications," or the familiar converse of those who inculcated false and pernicious principles, would "corrupt good manners;" and tend to self-indulgence, an undue regard to present ease, interest, or reputation; and a disposition to neglect their duty, conceal their sentiments, and avoid suffering for Christ's sake. Indeed, these principles had already produced these effects in many instances, and were diffusing their baleful influence. The apostle must therefore call upon the Christians at Corinth, to "awake righteously" (in a righteous manner, and as became righteous persons,) from the lethargy into which these delusions had thrown them: (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:8—14.) for while they were elated with an opinion of their superior knowledge, it was evident that some among them had not the humbling, sanctifying, and saving knowledge of God; and the communications of these persons "corrupted the good manners" of the rest. This must be spoken "to their shame," and it behooved them to be humbled for it, and ashamed of it: as far better things might have been expected from them, considering the opportunities which they had enjoyed, and the profession which they had made. (Marg. Ref. r—x.)—It is evident, that the apostle constantly aimed to bring the Corinthians to a more humble opinion of themselves, and gradually to draw them off from their false teachers.—Let us eat, &c. V. 35—38. The skeptics, who speculated concerning the resurrection, were ready, as the apostle well knew, to inquire, 'In what manner could the dead be raised, after their bodies had been turned to dust, mixed with other substances, and even become a part of other bodies?' And, if this were possible, 'With what bodies, or what sort of bodies, would they come forth from the graves? With such as they had on earth?'

39 [d]All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 There is [e]one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 So also [f]is the resurrection of the dead: it is sown [g]in corruption; [h]it is raised in incorruption:

43 It is sown [i]in dishonour, it is raised in glory: it is sown [k]in weakness, it is raised [l]in power:

44 It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. [Practical Observations.]

45 And so it is written, [m]The first man, Adam, was made a living soul, the last Adam was made [n]a quickening Spirit.

46 Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but [o]that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual.

47 The [p]first man is of the earth, earthy; the second Man is [q]the Lord from heaven.

48 As is the earthy, [r]such are they also that are earthy; [s]and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, [t]we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

or with others of a different form and constitution?' (Marg. Ref. y, z.) Such an inquirer the apostle addressed, as a foolish and ignorant man; who presumed to limit omnipotence, and to deny the possibility of an event, because he could not solve all difficulties about it, and comprehend in what manner it could take place. Whereas, even the ordinary productions of the earth exhibited a process, which might illustrate the subject: for the seed sown in the ground does not vegetate, except it corrupt and die. Some modern infidels have maintained, against the apostle, that the seed does not die in vegetation; because the germen lives, and expands itself, and only the extraneous matter corrupts. But, in fact, the seed, as such, does die: it ceases to be a grain of corn; though a part of it springs, as it were, into new life, by a process which we can no more fully comprehend, than we can the manner of the resurrection. Even "a prophet of their own," Lucretius the Epicurean atheist, says;—'Whatever change transfers a body into a new class of beings, may be justly called the death of the original substance. ... For what is changed from what it was, ... that dies.' Creech. The body sown is not the same which will exist, when it has sprung up and produced the full corn in the ear, but a "bare grain of wheat," barley, or other corn. This, after corrupting in the earth, by the wonderful power of God springs up and produces an increase; and he gives that increase "a body, as it pleaseth him." Yet, whatever else is changed, he always gives "to every seed its own body:" and so preserves a complete distinction between the different kinds of vegetable productions. (Marg. Ref. a. c. Note, John 12:23—26.) Thus the bodies of believers, after corrupting and turning to dust, will be raised in a new and more glorious form, not in every respect the same as they were, but far superior and more excellent. This will be done in the infinite wisdom, according to the sovereign will, and by the almighty power of God; but after a manner inexplicable to us.—The identity of the particles of matter, as necessary to the resurrection of the same body, is no where mentioned in Scripture: and this chapter strongly militates against that opinion. God has many other ways of preserving personal identity. Exactly the same particles do not constitute our bodies, for two hours together, in any part of our lives: yet we are the same persons, both in body and soul, from childhood to old age. There is then no necessity to clog the doctrine with this difficulty, which furnishes infidels with their most specious objections against it.—Many of the philosophers, and afterwards of the heretics, considered the body as the prison and sepulchre of the soul, from which it would at death be delivered. Such men, indeed, could not but dislike the doctrine of the resurrection, and be disposed to argue against it: yet the passage does not refer to objectors of this kind; at least, there is no proof that it does.

V. 39—44. We are here called to reflect on the variety, as well as the wonderful nature, of the works of God, in order to exalt our thoughts concerning his infinite power and wisdom; and thus to silence all objections arising from the difficulties which seem to stand in the way. "The flesh" of different animals (as well as the form of vegetables,) is differently constituted, produced, and supported: yet we cannot comprehend the manner, in which the Creator has made and preserves this difference; though it is evidently intended to fit them for their several kinds of life, their diverse elements, nutriment, and uses. Cannot he then raise our bodies, suited to the state intended for them, consistently with our personal identity, and in a manner inexplicable to us? The same varied wisdom and power of God has formed "celestial," as well as "terrestrial bodies;" but the celestial appear far more splendid than the terrestrial: yet, even among the former, there are different degrees of glory; as they are in themselves, or as they appear to us. The sun is far more glorious than the moon; yet the reflected light of the moon far exceeds that of the remote stars; and some of them shine more brightly than others. (Marg. Ref. e. Note, Gen. 1:14—19.) Thus also will it be in "the resurrection of the dead;" the bodies of the righteous will appear as much more glorious than they now do, as the heavenly luminaries excel a clod of the earth; yet will they shine with different degrees of splendour, like the sun, moon, and stars. (Marg. Ref. f.)—The body, as born of dying Adam's race, and during its mortal state, and especially as dying, "is sown in corruption;" it tends to corruption, and after death it is speedily wasted and decayed: but at the resurrection it will be "raised in incorruption," without any seeds of mortality, disease, or decay in its constitution; fitted for a state of perfect health, vigour, and activity, to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) Here, during life, at death, and in the grave, the body "is sown in dishonour;" it lives as a condemned criminal; various sufferings and diseases are the forerunners of that execution of a criminal, which takes place at death with much ignominy and disgrace; and the wasting state of a dead corpse is very dishonourable in itself: though the death and burial of Christ have sanctified the grave to all believers, and his resurrection has assured us that the body shall be "raised in glory." But the triumph over death and the grave will be honourable; the body will be rendered most beautiful and glorious; it will be made fit for that heavenly felicity, and those employments in which angels are associated; and it will resemble the glorified body of the Lord Jesus himself, the "First-born from the dead." (Notes, 55—58. Luke 20:27—38, vv. 35,36. Phil. 3:20,21.) "It is" also "sown in weakness:" our manifold diseases, and death in which they terminate, are peculiar evidences of human imbecility, and the state of the body in the ground, devoured by worms, and turning to the dust, shows most affectingly how little all men's power and abilities can do for them. (Notes, Ps. 49:6—15.) But the body of a believer will not only be raised by almighty power; it will also be endued with "power," vigour and activity, of which we have no conception; and be rendered capable of such motions, and of producing such effects, as utterly surpass whatever we have heard, seen, or imagined. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) In short, the body is here sown a "natural," or an animal body: it resembles the bodies of animals, in its wants, appetites, pains, and diseases; and after death it returns to dust as they do: but hereafter it will be raised a "spiritual body," capable of the spiritual employment, worship, and happiness of heaven; entirely refined from all sensual dross and low desires; needing no more food, rest, sleep, or recreation; no longer capable of desiring or relishing animal pleasures; and no more a clog to the soul, but a helper to it in all holy exercises. (Notes, Matt. 17:1,2. P. O. 1—13. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) For there is "a natural body" suited to our state on earth, and a "spiritual body" suited to the heavenly state; nor can these be in every respect the same. 'In this state, we are forced to serve our bodies, and to attend their leisure, and mightily depend upon them in the operations of the mind: in the other, our bodies shall wholly serve our spirits, and minister unto them, and depend on them, and therefore may be styled "spiritual." Whitby.

50 Now [u]this I say, brethren, [x]that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, [y]I show you a mystery; [z]We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be [a]changed, 52 In [b]a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the [c]last trump; [d]for the trumpet shall sound, [e]and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

53 For this corruptible must [f]put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and [g]this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, [h]Death is swallowed up in victory.

with it; so that, ever since the fall of Adam, all his descendants, by natural generation, are "dead in sin;" and the very mind of man had been carnal, as well as his body mortal. But "the last Adam," the last Surety, or Covenant-head, of any of the human race, "was a quickening Spirit:" the Author and Source of spiritual and eternal life to all his people, by the supply of his Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Gen. 2: 7,16,17. 3:6. John 1:4,5. 5:20—27. 11:20—27. Rom. 5:12—19. 8:1,2.) Nor does this life-giving energy relate only to their souls; for he will also "quicken," or make alive, "their mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in them;" and this is here principally intended. (Note, Rom. 8:10,11.) But the "natural" and carnal state, in both cases, precedes the "spiritual:" all are born in sin, bearing the image of "the first Adam:" some are afterwards "born again," to bear the image of "the second Adam;" the soul continuing numerically and identically the same, though newly created. (Notes, John 3:3—8.) In like manner, all men first have a natural and mortal body like that of Adam, and at length believers shall have an incorruptible and spiritual body, like that of Christ; yet it will be in one sense "the same body," equally theirs, though in another sense it will be changed. "The first man" was formed of the dust "of the earth," and was 'earthy" in his nature and original; (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Gen. 3:17—19.) but "the second Man," to whom all believers are united and conformed, "is the Lord from heaven," "The Lord of glory," JEHOVAH, God in human nature. (Marg. Ref. q.) As long as we are conformed to "the earthy" Adam, which, in respect of our bodies, will be till the resurrection, we "are earthy:" our bodies, during life, are gross, animal, and diseased; and after death, they turn to the dust whence they were taken. But when we shall be conformed "to the heavenly" Adam; our bodies will become heavenly, and suited to that spiritual and immortal felicity, to which we shall be admitted. Even the apostle, and all Christians, had borne the image of the earthy Adam; but they were assured by the promise of God, that they should at length "bear the image of the heavenly Adam;" not only in their souls, but in their bodies also, which will be raised very different, in their appearance and capacities, from what they were when on earth. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) Thus all philosophical objections were shown to have their foundation in ignorance of the "Scriptures, and of the power of God." (Note, Matt. 22:23—33.)—The last Adam. (45) "The second Man," 47.—As if none of the human race had existed, except Adam and Christ. For all men will at length be considered either as in Adam or in Christ: unbelievers as one with fallen Adam, and in him; all believers as in Christ, and one with him. (Note, Rom. 5:12—21.)—Was made, &c. (45) From the Sept. which accords to the Hebrew: but the "first man, Adam," is added by way of explanation. (Gen. 2:7.)

V. 50—54. A similar change to that which will take place at the resurrection of the just, must also be made in the bodies of those who shall be found alive at the day of judgment: for "flesh and blood," the human body in its present form and gross manner of subsistence, and with its present animal wants, propensities, and infirmities, "cannot inherit the kingdom of God," or partake of its pure and refined pleasures: nor can "corruption," or the body as mortal and corruptible, "inherit incorruption," or the holy incorruptible, and unchangeable felicity of heaven. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) The apostle therefore "showed a mystery,' which could not be known except by immediate revelation, or understood except by faith receiving that revelation. (Marg. Ref. y.) Speaking of the whole multitude of believers, to the end of time as constituting one family to which he and the Corinthian Christians belonged, he might say, "We shall not all sleep," or die, "but we shall all be changed." Yet he elsewhere speaks of himself, as one of those who should be "raised up by Jesus." (2 Cor. 4:14.) So that there can be no ground for the supposition, which many have formed from his language, that he expected to live till the coming of Christ, which he judged to be very near. The notion also of others, that he alluded to the first resurrection, previous to the millennium, is inconsistent with the language of the passage: for those who have died, or shall die before the millennium, as truly "sleep in Jesus," though they should arise immediately; as they do, who shall remain in the state of the dead till the general resurrection. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.) The apostle therefore only meant to speak of himself as belonging to that one family, of whom the far greater part would die and be raised again, and all the rest must "be changed." This change will be effected "in a moment," instantaneously, as the eye twinkles, by the almighty power of Christ, when the last trumpet shall sound, as the summons to all men to meet their Judge. (Notes, Matt. 24:29—31. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) Then the voice of Christ will be heard by all the dead, and they will be raised again to life in their own order; and then the bodies of living believers will be changed from "natural" to "spiritual," from "corruptible to incorruptible," from "mortal to immortal:" even as a man's form is changed by putting on new raiment. (Marg. Ref. z—f. Notes, John 5:28,29. Rev. 20:11—15.) 'The body, which but a moment before appeared just as ours now do, shall, quick as thought, be changed into the image of that worn by our triumphant Lord: and fitted for all the active services, and the purest sensations and delights of the celestial state.' Doddridge. (Note, Phil. 3:20,21.) When this change has taken place in respect of all believers, then the saying of the prophet will finally be accomplished. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Is. 25:6—8.) Death and all his power shall be annihilated, and "swallowed up" for ever, in the complete victory obtained over him by Christ and his people; and sin, with all its consequences, shall ever after be wholly confined to the place "prepared for the devil and his angels."—The apostle showed the Corinthians a mystery, by informing them of the event that would take place; yet, in respect to the manner in which it would be effected, it still remained mysterious and incomprehensible. Thus the mysteries of the Trinity, and of the incarnation of "the Lord from heaven," are revealed to us as certainly true; but the manner of them still remains inexplicable. (Notes, Matt. 13:10,11. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Death, &c. (54) Much nearer to the Hebrew, than to the LXX. (Is. 25:8.)

V. 55—58. With the glorious prospect, before the eyes of his faith and hope, the apostle in the most beautiful and animated apostrophe, addressed "death and the grave," or the unseen state, as real persons, the universal and most terrible conquerors and oppressors of the human race. He demanded of death, "Where is thy sting?" or destructive dart, or spear, with which he had caused such anguish and terror, and wrought such wide-spread desolations. And of "the grave," what was now become of his victory, by which he seemed to have shut up in his dark dungeon as vanquished foes, all the generations of men that had lived on earth. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) Indeed, the sin of man was "the sting" and destructive weapon of death, which both enabled him to kill the body, and had made that fatal stroke most tremendous: and the holy "law," pronouncing the sentence of condemnation against every transgressor, gave "sin power" to bring death upon mankind, and to embitter its agonies with the dread of future punishment. This was the natural and universal state of man; and all must have thus lived, died, and perished miserably, had not God provided deliverance. (Notes, Rom. 5:12—14,20,21. 7:7—14,22—25.) But Christians might now unite in returning thanks to God with joyful hearts, for having "given them the victory" over these dreadful foes, "by Jesus Christ" through his atoning sufferings and glorious resurrection; and for bringing them by his grace, to faith and hope in him. They might therefore, at present, triumph over the fear of death, in confidence of a glorious resurrection for their bodies, as well as of immediate and eternal happiness for their souls: and they would al

He therefore exhorted his "beloved brethren," to continue [r]"steadfast" in the profession and faith of the gospel, and in their adherence to the truth and will of God amidst all dangers and temptations: and especially to continue "unmoveable" in the belief of the resurrection, notwithstanding the artifices and plausible reasonings of false teachers. At the same time, let them [s]"always" abound in all those good works, which the commandment and honour of their Lord required, they had the fullest assurances, that their "labour in the Lord," arising from such motives as his gospel suggested, and especially from love to the Lord Jesus, and zeal for his honour, would by no means be "in vain," either unrewarded or unsuccessful; but that the whole of it would terminate in his glory, the good of mankind, and their own everlasting advantage. (Note, 12—18.)—Every part of this animated discourse shows, that the resurrection of true believers is exclusively intended: for the things spoken will not be fulfilled, either in respect of the dead, or of those who will be found alive, when Christ shall come to judgment, as to any others but true believers, by whatever name, form, or creed, they are distinguished. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. When the faithful minister sees his beloved people drawn aside to embrace dangerous errors; his chief comfort, under the trial, must arise from being able to appeal to them, that the doctrine which he preached was scriptural; and from a full satisfaction, that they who received it, and stand fast in it, will be certainly saved: and that none of them can perish, if they keep in remembrance the instructions which he gave them; unless they deceived themselves with a vain, a dead, and inefficient faith. In order that we may possess this comfort, we must be careful to deliver the truths of revelation pure, as we have received them: and in that order, proportion, and connexion in which they stand in the Scriptures: and he who duly attends to these sacred oracles will know assuredly, that the "death of Christ for our sins," and his "resurrection for our justification," are essential and fundamental doctrines, which must, in all places, and on all occasions, be explicitly and strenuously insisted on. Apostles and prophets concur in bearing testimony to them, even more than to many other important truths: and blessed be God, the demonstration of our LORD's resurrection is equal to the weight, which is to be supported by that important fact. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—The most eminent Christians are always the most humble: they continually reflect on the aggravated sins of their unconverted state: especially if they were long or greatly set in opposition to the gospel. The more evident it is, that God has pardoned them, the less disposed will they be to excuse themselves. They feel their unworthiness of the distinctions conferred on them; they are disposed "in honour to prefer others to themselves:" and, though they cannot but be conscious of what the Lord has done for and by them: yet, taking their whole conduct and obligations together, they readily conclude, that none surely are so unfruitful and unprofitable as they. In reality, it is a great thing for a man with propriety, humility and truth, to say, "By the grace of God, I am what I am:" the declaration becomes those alone, who are walking under the influence of holy principles, and live a holy life: and is utterly unsuitable to the character of the negligent or formal professor of evangelical truth. But if we really fear and love the Lord, and walk in his ways, we shall ascribe all the glory to his grace and mercy: if "much have been forgiven" us, we should pray to be enabled to love much: (Note, Luke 7:44—50.) if our conversion have been remarkable, we should earnestly desire, that "the grace bestowed on us may not be in vain:" if we have set out late in life to serve the Lord; we should aim to "redeem the time" which has been lost, by labouring more abundantly" than our brethren: and, while we charge all our sins and follies upon ourselves, we must remember to ascribe all the good which we do, to "the grace of God that is with us." (Note, 1 Chr 29:10—19.)

V. 12—19. With what varied subtle devices doth Satan bring in false doctrines, by men of abilities, learning, or eloquence; in a covert and plausible manner, that the simple may suspect no danger! Heretical teachers often with apparent modesty question whether we have rightly understood the sacred writers, and whether the doctrine which they oppose be contained in them. They inquire, whether a more rational interpretation may not be given to this and the other text; whether the more obvious meaning do not involve absurdity, or even impossibility; whether any but the weak and illiterate can credit such mysteries or absurdities; and whether we had not better adopt a figurative sense, or admit some other reading, or even suppose the sacred writer to be mistaken; than assent to so incomprehensible, and therefore irrational, a doctrine. If indeed they could prove the mysteries which they oppose, to be contrary to fact, to intuition, or to demonstration, their principles might be admitted: but when they apply them to doctrines, which are merely above reason, and contrary to their supposed probabilities, and vain reasonings; they are perfectly inadmissible and irrational: unless man be wiser than his Maker. The dupes, however, of such specious pretences are seldom aware, whither these rational improvements of the creed and of the Scriptures tend: they do not perceive, that, according to them, man's presumptuous reason sits in judgment on the infinite wisdom of God; man's weakness is made the standard of omnipotence; and man's conjecture, the measure of divine revelation. Indeed, this is perfectly consistent with those economical and political sentiments, contended for by some of these oracles of an enlightened age; by which children are set to judge, whether their parents are fit to be honoured and obeyed, or not; servants are called on to determine the same concerning their masters, and subjects concerning their rulers; and, in short, not only is all subordination virtually destroyed, but, in every relation, the inferior is constituted the judge of his superior, without any appeal from his arrogant tribunal.—In like manner, the principles before cited, when fairly examined, are found to involve consequences, subversive of those truths, which are professedly venerated; to invalidate the testimony of Scripture, and tend to universal skepticism: they prove, (if they prove any thing,) that the preaching of the apostles, and the faith of primitive believers, "were vain;" and that the martyrs for the gospel were "false witnesses against God," by testifying truths and facts, which remote posterity has found out to be false, or needless. This is especially the case, in respect of those doctrines which relate to the Person, undertaking, and atonement of Christ; and the way of acceptance by faith in him. I. "Christ had not risen," his sacrifice could not have been depended on, because there could be no proof that it was accepted; and consequently even true believers must still be "in their sins:" those who "died in this faith must have perished;" the preachers of the gospel must either have been deceivers or deceived; and the disciples, having only "hope in Christ," as to this present world, must have been "of all men most miserable." To what then must the tenets of those lead, who indeed profess to believe that Christ is risen; yet deny, explain away, or overlook those great doctrines, which he especially rose again to establish and demonstrate?

V. 20—28. Blessed be God, we have the most complete and satisfactory proof, that Christ both "died for our sins," "and rose again for our justification," and as "the Firstfruits" of our resurrection; that, as death entered by man, so might life eternal be introduced by One in our nature. We certainly know, that "in Adam all die;" and we are expressly informed by "the sure testimony of God," that as in Christ all the human race shall arise, so all who are in him shall arise to immortal glory. Undoubtedly, the suffering, dying, risen, and ascended Saviour will soon appear, to raise the dead and judge the world: may we be then found among "those, that are Christ's at his coming!" It should be with us a matter of serious inquiry, whether we are his true disciples or not: for soon "the end will come;" the mediatorial "kingdom will be delivered up to God, even the Father;" and all who shall then be found enemies, will be put under the feet of Christ, and be punished with everlasting destruction. Would we then triumph in that most solemn and infinitely important crisis, we must now submit to his rule, accept of his salvation, and live to the glory of God through him. Then shall we at length rejoice in all his victories: and participate his glories: we shall exult with immense satisfaction, in the blessed accomplishment of the Redeemer's undertaking: and, as being with him, our Head in human nature; put under the absolute dominion of our reconciled Father, "that God may be all in all;" that he may receive the whole glory of our salvation; and that we may for ever serve him, and enjoy his favour, without sin or death; and without needing repentance, forgiveness, a sacrifice, or a Mediator, any more to all eternity.

V. 29—34. Should we lose sight of the animating prospect

CHAPTER XVI.

The apostle directs the Corinthians, in what way to make collections for the Christians at Jerusalem, 1—4; states his intentions about visiting them, 5—9; commends Timothy, who was coming to them, 10, 11; shows that Apollos declines visiting them at present, 12; exhorts them to vigilance, steadfastness, and love, 13, 14; recommends the household of Stephanas to their especial regard, 15, 16; expresses his satisfaction at the coming of certain persons from Corinth, 17, 18; and, after salutations from the churches, concludes in the most awful, yet affectionate manner, 19—24.

NOW [a]concerning the collection for [b]the saints, as I have given order to [c]the churches of Galatia, even so do ye.

a Acts 11:28—30. 24:17. Rom. 15:25,26. 2 Cor. 8:9. Gal. 2:10. b Acts 9:41. Rom. 12:13. 2 Cor. 9:12—15. Philem. 5—7. Heb. 6:10. 1 John 3:17. c Acts 16:6. 18:23. Gal. 1:2. d Luke 24:1. John 20:19,26. Acts 20:7. Rev. 1:10. e Gen. 25:12. 30:27,30. 32:10. 33:11. Deut. 8:18. 15:11—14. 2 Chr. 31:10. Hag. 2:16—19.

in the preceding verses set before us; should any one prevail in attempting to argue us out of these our expectations; how must our zeal, diligence, and boldness be enervated, and our rejoicing damped! Who then would step forward to succeed those illustrious soldiers of Christ, that have nobly bled in the cause of truth? Who would confess him in this evil world? Why should we stand amidst dangers and alarms continually? Why should we venture the rage of men, more venomous than serpents, and more subtle than foxes, and more savage than tigers or lions? Such principles would soon induce us to depart from our constancy, and make us exclaim, "What advantageth it us, if the dead rise not?" or even tempt us to say, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Let us not then suffer ourselves to be deceived by corrupt seasoners; but let us separate from them, and venture our all for eternity, on the single testimony of "God, who cannot lie." Let us fear associating with skeptical, profligate, or ungodly men; for "evil communications corrupt good manners:" let us warn our children, our juniors, our hearers, to shun them as a pestilence: let us "awake to righteousness, and sin not;" let us not hearken to those, who know not God, in whatever science else they may excel; being assured that this ignorance will be found shameful, in proportion to the abilities, opportunities, confidence, or profession, of those in whom it is found.

V. 35—44. If any are still disposed to start objections, or make presumptuous inquiries, when truths are scripturally proposed; let them remember the appellation, which the apostle, or rather the Holy Spirit, gives to such "wise men of this world:" For they may thence learn, that man's wisdom consists in becoming "a little child," and simply believing his Maker. The works of creation and providence read us daily lectures of humility; as well as teach us to admire the variety of the great Creator's wisdom and goodness. Till we can fully comprehend the whole process, by which a bare grain, corrupting in the earth, produces many ears of corn at the harvest; and till we can satisfactorily answer all questions, and solve all difficulties about it; let us learn to be the pupils, and not assume to be the counsellors of the most High: and let us hold fast the sure hope of a glorious resurrection, without perplexing ourselves about the manner, in which infinite wisdom and almighty power can effect it.

V. 45—58. They, who "shall be accounted worthy" to obtain felicity in the heavenly state, will excel in glory all present splendours, far more than the celestial bodies transcend the terrestrial: and yet they shall exceed one another in glory, as "one star differeth from another;" while Christ, "the Sun of Righteousness," shall infinitely outshine them all. This degraded, corruptible, sinful, and dying body, shall be raised "incorruptible, immortal, and glorious:" it shall become vigorous, active, and beautiful, beyond conception: this animal body shall be raised spiritual. Here our very souls are carnal: there our very bodies will be spiritual. And our "second Adam, the Lord from Heaven," will give new and immortal life, as "a quickening Spirit," both to our souls and bodies; that in both, according to our measure, we may bear his image and glorify his name.—As "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" let us not "sow to the flesh, of which we can only reap corruption:" (Note, Gal. 6:6—10.) and, as those who shall be exempted from death, must be changed, let this reconcile our minds to that change, which death will begin and the resurrection complete in our bodies, when "death shall be swallowed up in victory." Let us seek the full assurance of faith and hope, that in the midst of pain, and in the prospect of dissolution, we may triumphantly exclaim, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" that we may hail the sharpest pangs of dying; and think without emotion on the darkness, the corruption, and the imaginary horrors of the tomb: assured that there our bodies will sleep at ease; that in the mean time our souls will be present with our beloved Redeemer; and that our bodies will shortly arise, to share that unspeakable felicity.—But "sin is the sting of death," and who can disarm that "king of terrors?" For "the law is the strength of sin;" and who can answer its demands, endure its curse, or expiate his own transgressions? Hence the terror and the anguish: hence the wretched cleave to life, save when infidelity, despair, and rebellion induce madness and suicide. Hence, death is justly terrible to the unbelieving and impenitent: hence, the needless alarms of the weak and trembling believer. "Thanks be to God," that there is deliverance, and victory for us in Christ Jesus! (Note, Rom. 7:22—25.)

2 Upon [d]the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, [e]as God hath prospered him, [f]that there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And [g]when I come, [h]whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your [i]liberality unto Jerusalem.

4 And [j]if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

5 Now I will come unto you, [k]when I shall pass

May he give us faith and hope, and increase our faith and hope; that we may not only be safe, but joyful and triumphant! And, having these assurances, let "us be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord: as knowing that our labour is not in vain in the Lord." (Note, 1 John 3:1—3.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. It is evident, that the Corinthians had been previously made acquainted with the apostle's intention, of raising a contribution from the Gentile churches, for the poor Christians in Judea: and, as they were more wealthy than most of their brethren, he did not intimate even a doubt of their liberality in that good work. But he judged it proper, to point out to them the method, about which he had given orders in the churches of Galatia, whence he had lately come. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Acts 18:18—23. 24:10—21. Rom. 15:22—29. 2 Cor. 8:9.) "On the first day of the week," let every man treasure up a proportion of his gains, according as God had prospered him during the preceding week: for thus a larger sum would gradually be provided, than could at once have been collected. (Marg. Ref. d—f.)—Some are of opinion, that the sums, thus set apart, were brought to the treasury of the church at the time: but the words do not seem to admit of that interpretation; and if each separately laid by the sum which he purposed to give, the whole would be brought together at once, when necessary, without any trouble in soliciting contributions.—"Laying it up as a treasure:" For these are the true riches, laid up in heaven, entrusted to God, to be compensated with the amplest interest, both in this world and the next; though not of their own value, but of his mere liberality. Beza.—Worldly men, at certain times, augment the treasure which they have before laid up, by adding their clear gains to it; let Christians then imitate them, by laying up on the Lord's day, for their poor and distressed brethren, according "as God had prospered them;" and let them count this their treasure. If this was kept apart by each person, till wanted, so that none knew what others gave; ostentation and corrupt emulation would be far more effectually excluded: than if each brought his contribution to the common stock every week, and so a public account was taken of it. It was especially needful, that this precaution should be taken at Corinth, where ostentation and emulation greatly prevailed; and it is evident, that the apostle intended, as much as possible, to leave every one, in this respect, to determine for himself before God, what he ought to do; that none might give more than he could properly spare, or than he was from proper motives inclined to, either to aquire applause, or to escape censure and contempt.—The argument from this passage for the observance of the first day of the week, as "the Lord's day," the Christian sabbath, is very conclusive: for, unless that were the custom in apostolical churches, why should "the first day of the week" be mentioned in this connexion? 'On Sunday, says Justin Martyr, all Christians, in the city or country, meet together, because that is the day, of our Lord's resurrection: and then we read the writings of the prophets and apostles. This being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, exhorting them to imitate and do the things which they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament. Whitby. (Notes, John 20:19—23. Acts 20:7—12, v. 7. Rev. 1:9—11, v. 10.)

V. 3, 4. Every thing having been previously arranged, the apostle, when he arrived at Corinth, would send with the bounty of the Corinthians such persons as they approved and would recommend by their letters. Or joining the words, "by letters," with the latter clause, whomsoever they approved, the apostle would send, with letters from himself to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem: but if it was thought more satisfactory to all concerned, he himself would accompany the messengers. V. 5—9. The apostle was meditating to made a progress through Macedonia, when he wrote this epistle: and he seems to have given some intimations, that he would go to Corinth in his way to Macedonia, as well as on his return through Macedonia; for I do pass through Macedonia:

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, [l]and winter with you, [m]that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, [n]if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry [o]at Ephesus until [p]Pentecost.

9 For [q]a great [r]door and effectual is opened unto me, [s]and there are many adversaries.

10 Now, [t]if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you [u]without fear: [x]for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do.

11 Let [y]no man therefore despise him; [z]but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

[Practical Observations.]

12 As touching [a]our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come [b]when he shall have convenient time.

13 [c]Watch ye, [d]stand fast in the faith, [e]quit you like men, [f]be strong.

14 Let [g]all your things be done with charity.

15 I beseech you, brethren, (ye know [h]the house of Stephanas, that it is [i]the first fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves [k]to the ministry of the saints.)

16 That [l]ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that [m]helpeth with us, and [n]laboureth.

17 I am glad of the coming of [o]Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus: [p]for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied.

18 For [q]they have refreshed my spirit and yours: [r]therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

19 The [s]churches of Asia salute you. [t]Aquila though it is not here mentioned. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:15,16.) He had, however, formed his determination of coming; and he assured his brethren at Corinth, that he would make some stay among them, "if the Lord would give him leave:" for he did not think it sufficient, merely to call on them, as a traveller in his journey, when so many things and of so great importance required his presence among them. (Marg. Ref. k—n.) It was, therefore, his design to continue at Ephesus till the feast of Pentecost; the rest of the summer he meant to employ in his progress through Macedonia; and then perhaps to spend the winter at Corinth; expecting that the Corinthians would afterwards help him forward in his journey, "whithersoever he should go." Perhaps he intended to sail from Ephesus to Corinth first; then after a short stay to go into Macedonia, and afterwards return to winter there. But he thought it incumbent on him to stay some time longer at Ephesus; as great opportunities of service were afforded him; great success attended his labours; and "many adversaries" were excited to oppose him, to terrify or dissuade men from embracing the gospel, or to discourage and mislead the new converts. His presence therefore was peculiarly necessary; though his dangers and hardships were proportionably increased. (Marg. Ref. o—s. Note, 15:31—34.)—It is evident, from the concluding salutation, that the apostle wrote this epistle from Ephesus, though the spurious addition at the close dates it from Philippi. It is probable, that the tumult made at Ephesus by Demetrius, hastened the apostle's departure; (Notes, Acts 19:21—41.) and his plan seems in other respects to have been circumstantially deranged. V. 10, 11. Timothy had been sent before the apostle into Madedonia, with directions to visit Corinth: (Notes, 4:14—17. Acts 19:21,22.) but such was the disposition of many in that city, that it was necessary to charge them not to behave improperly to him when he came. For the apostle was apprehensive, that their party-quarrels, and opposition to his authority, would induce them to show so marked a dislike to Timothy, and even contempt of him, as to make him afraid of executing his commission among them. The apostle therefore assured the Christians at Corinth, that Timothy was faithful and skilful, in "the work of the Lord," even as he was: let none of them therefore despise him because of his youth, or his supposed deficiency in "the wisdom of words and excellency of speech:" let them encourage and countenance him, in bearing testimony against the evils which had taken place among them: let them not take offence at his faithfulness, or permit him to go away, as one who had incurred their displeasure: but let them conduct him forth, in peace and love, on his journey towards Ephesus, where the apostle expected him with the brethren who accompanied him; or both he and the brethren at Ephesus expected him, as one whom they greatly loved. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Luke 10:16. Phil. 2:19—23. 1 Thes. 4:6—8. 1 Tim. 4:11—16. Tit. 2:15.)—Probably Timothy returned to Ephesus, before Paul was driven thence.—'We infer that Timothy was not sent with the epistle: for had he been the bearer of the letter, would St. Paul in that letter have said, "If Timothy come?" ... If he was with the apostle, when he wrote the letter, could he say, ... "I look for him with the brethren?" ... Timothy was sent forth upon his journey before the letter was written; but he might not reach Corinth, till after the letter arrived there. Acts 19:21.' Paley.—With the brethren. (11) Either those who had accompanied Timothy into Macedonia, or some whom the apostle expected from Corinth.

V. 12. It seems, that a party at Corinth professed themselves attached to Apollos, in order to cover their opposition to the apostle: (Notes, 1:10—16. Acts 18:24—28.) yet St. Paul greatly desired and exhorted that eminent minister to go among them, with Timothy and Erastus, or with Stephanas and his friends, when they returned to Corinth; (Notes, 15—18. Acts 19:21,22.) being of opinion that his presence would help to allay their disputes, having the most entire confidence in his wisdom and humility. But perhaps Apollos feared lest his presence should have a contrary effect; or he might be fully employed in another place; or perhaps he thought it right to express his decided disapprobation of the conduct of the Corinthians, by absenting himself till they came to a better temper. However, he was not at all willing to go to Corinth at that time; though he intended to visit them when he could with more convenience and propriety. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. The apostle, about to conclude his epistle, called on his brethren and beloved children at Corinth, instead of presuming on their gifts and privileges, to stand upon their guard against temptations, and be vigilant in avoiding the snares of the great deceiver and his servants. He exhorted them to "stand fast in the faith," as they were in great danger, and already began to waver: he reminded them to be valiant and prudent, as it became men, in their conflict with their common enemies; and not to behave like children in disputing with one another, and "envying one another:" he directed them to be "strong in the grace of Christ" for their work and warfare, instead of amusing themselves with curious speculations: (Marg. Ref. c—f:) and, above all, he warned them to manage all their concerns according to the dictates of that love, which he had so fully explained, and so pathetically recommended to them. (*Marg. V. 15—18. (Note, 1:10—16.) Stephanas seems to have been with the apostle at Ephesus, when he wrote this; but his household or family remained at Corinth. The seven persons belonging to his family were qualified for usefulness, and ought to have possessed great influence in that church: as they were the oldest converts to Christianity in all Achaia; (Note, Rom. 16:5.) and as they had habitually devoted themselves to every service, by which they could minister to the good of their brethren. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) The apostle therefore besought the Christians at Corinth, to "submit themselves" to the counsel, influence, or ministry of this family and of others, who concurred with him and them, in endeavours to promote the peace and purity of the church, or laboured diligently in that good cause. (*Marg. (*Marg. V. 19, 20. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 16:5—16,21—23.)—Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus, when this epistle was written; but they had returned to Rome before the apostle wrote to the Christians in that city. (Note, Rom. 16:3,4.)

V. 21—24. An amanuensis had written the rest of the epistle: but the apostle thought proper to add what follows with his own hand; and to unite a most solemn and awful warning with his affectionate salutations, that it might make the deeper impression. Whatever gifts, knowledge, eloquence, or eminence any man possessed; or in whatever imaginable way he might be distinguished; yet if "he did not love the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha." If he had not a cordial love to the person, salvation, precepts, cause, glory, and people of Christ, he was and would be "accursed," until and when the Lord should come; though he did not appear as an open enemy to him and his cause. If his conduct prove that he did not love the Lord Jesus, let him be separated from the church, as "an accursed thing" devoted to destruction: and in case he did not afterwards repent, and believe with that "faith which worketh by love;" Christ himself would execute this awful sentence, when he came to judge the world. But if it could not be proved, or was not at all suspected by men, yet it was known to the Lord; and he who had not genuine love to the Saviour, certainly abode under the wrath of God, and would at last sink into utter destruction, as a sacrifice to his justice. For he who does not love the divine Redeemer, must be an enemy to the holy perfections and righteous government of God, an unhumbled impenitent sinner, and an unbeliever, under the covenant of works and the curse of the law: he must be destitute of all true holiness, incapable of spiritually performing any good work, and unfit for the employment and pleasures of heaven: whoever does not "love the Lord Jesus," whether an open unbeliever, or a professed Christian, or an apostate, must certainly be numbered at the day of judgment, among the enemies of God, and have his portion with them. (Marg. Ref. x—b. Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. 25:34—46. *P. 'When the Jews lost the power of life and death; they used nevertheless to pronounce an anathema on persons, who according to the Mosaic law, should have been executed: and such a person became an anathema; ... and to express their faith, that God would, in one way or other interpose to add that efficacy to his own sentence, which they could not give it, it is very probable that they might use the word Maran-atha, that is, in Syriac, 'The Lord cometh;' and he will put the sentence in execution.' Doddridge.—The apostle, however, did not write this awful warning (for which he saw too much occasion in the conduct of the Corinthian teachers,) from resentment or harshness of spirit; he therefore expressed his earnest desire that the grace and favour of the Lord Jesus might be with them, and rest on them: and he concluded by such an assurance of his cordial love to them all, in Christ and for his sake, as is not found in any other epistle. To this he annexed his Amen, as assuring them of his sincerity in it; notwithstanding the rebukes which he had given them, and the improper treatment which he had received from them. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. It is incumbent on ministers to exhort their people to liberal charity, especially towards their brethren in Christ; and to direct them in the best way of collecting and applying their contributions: and all Christians ought to be "ready for every good work," in proportion "as the Lord prospers" them in their secular concerns. When a little is weekly appropriated to such purposes, it is parted with more conveniently and less reluctantly, than when greater sums are required at once. For it is considered as a part of the weekly expense, and so spared in other things: but without some arrangement of this kind, the fund which should have been reserved for charitable uses is often previously spent on superfluities, and the sum required cannot well be afforded. Those weekly collections, therefore, which are made by several excellent societies, and, blessed be God, are becoming more and more general; in which even poor mechanics and labourers, nay children, by the constant payment of trivial contributions, raise annually large sums for the relief of the sick and destitute, and for aiding the distribution of the Scriptures, and the cause of missions into all regions; cannot be too warmly recommended. Much real good is done by them: the gospel is adorned and recommended; and the young and the poor are taught to retrench needless expenses, and to save that they may be able to give. Thus habits of the best and most useful kind are formed, which conduce eventually likewise to their own temporal comfort and benefit; while an excellent example is exhibited, and the rich are excited to a proportionable liberality. May such societies be established in all the churches of Christ! These charitable works well consist with the design of the Christian sabbath.—But when the funds are raised, prudent, pious, disinterested, and humane persons should be chosen to apply them: nor ought any man to count such a service foreign to his place, except he be necessarily engaged in still more important services. (Note, Acts 6:2—6.) All our purposes should be formed in submission to the will of God: and our conduct should be regulated by the dispensations of his providence, in connexion with the precepts of his word.—Ministers ought not readily to leave those places, in which "great and effectual doors are opened to them," even though there be many adversaries: nay, this circumstance may often render it more incumbent on them to continue in their post, though dangerous and difficult; that they may establish and encourage the weak or wavering. (Notes, Neh 6:10—14. Acts 6:1—6.)—It is wonderful that those who attend on the work of the Lord, in the most faithful manner, should have cause for fear, even among professors of the gospel; or be in danger of being despised and disquieted by them. Yet the prevalence of party, the influence of corrupt teachers, or the infection of antinomian principles, frequently produce this effect; especially when those who are required to "reprove, rebuke, and exhort with all authority," are young, diffident, or deficient in external accomplishments. But senior ministers should use their influence to repress this spirit; that their faithful young brethren may be secured from contempt, enabled to do their work in peace, and receive due kindness from those among whom they labour.

V. 12—24. The zealous servants of Christ are commonly harmonious among themselves, even when their injudicious hearers place them in competition with each other. They concur in opposing every error and evil, though they may have different opinions, about the best method of remedying them; and therefore they will leave others to follow their own judgment, even when different from their own.—Exhortations to vigilance, constancy in duty, steadfastness in the faith, and mutual love, can never be unseasonable. Those who have "addicted themselves to the labour" of love, in ministering to the saints, are most worthy of respect and imitation; and not they who are most fluent in speech, and forward to assume the lead in public concerns. We should also willingly submit to those, who are experienced and mature in the faith of Christ; or who labour to promote that cause, for which the apostles spent and laid down their lives.—Faithful and pious persons may supply what is lacking in each other; and their conversation will refresh the spirits of such as are like-minded. Christians, though divided by seas and mountains, and though they disapprove of some things in each other's creed or practice, will yet cordially love and pray for one another. But they, who "love not the Lord Jesus Christ," can be Christians only in name; and they must certainly abide under an awful curse, which the Lord when he cometh will execute. (P. O. Matt. 25:41—46.) Our obligations to the divine Saviour, and our reasons for loving him, are infinite: yet many who are called by his name, who profess his truth, nay, who preach his gospel, are strangers to this holy love, and only seek their own advantage, credit, ease, or pleasure, in their religious performances. They may conceal this fatal defect from the most discerning of their fellow-servants; but "the Lord when he cometh" will surely detect it. Let us then call ourselves to account in this matter, and not be satisfied with any religion, which does not include and express the supreme love of Christ, earnest desires of his salvation, gratitude for his mercies, zeal for his glory, and obedience to his commandments. Let us inquire, whether we do indeed "count all things" worthless, compared with Christ and his righteousness; whether we be willing to give up worldly objects when they come in competition with him; whether we love his image in his people; and be willing to deny ourselves, that we may communicate to their wants; whether we love his ordinances as means of communion with him; whether we rejoice to hear him glorified, and grieve to see him dishonoured; whether we allow ourselves in any known sin, or the neglect of any known duty; whether we keep his commandments unreservedly and habitually; yet grieve that we keep them not more perfectly: (Notes, John 14:15—24. 15:12—16. 21:15—17. and whether we copy his example and long to be conformed to him, being greatly humbled by the consciousness of imitating him in so defective a measure, and of being so little transformed into his holy image. By these inquiries, impartially answered, we may form a good judgment of the state of our souls.—But, while we warn those around us not to deceive themselves, we should beware of the appearance of anger and resentment. We should affectionately and zealously long that the grace of Christ may be with those, whom we thus caution; and we ought to assure those of our cordial love in Christ, whom we reprove and warn in the most plain and solemn manner, and who have acted the most improperly towards us.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

THIS epistle seems to have been written about a year after the foregoing, while the apostle was on his progress through Macedonia. Having heard by Titus, that his first epistle had produced very good effects on many of the Corinthians; he wrote this also, in order to prepare the way more completely for his visit to them: and it is probable, that he sent it immediately by Titus and some others who accompanied him. (Notes, 2:12,13. 7:5—7.) In it he justified himself from the charge of levity, or wordly policy, in delaying his journey to Corinth; and assigned those reasons for this part of his conduct, which could not have been disclosed with propriety, till the effect of his former epistle had appeared. (Note, 1:15—24.) He also gave directions respecting the restoration of the incestuous person, who had been excommunicated. (2.) He then expatiated on his own conduct in the Christian ministry; intermixing many exhortations with the avowal of his motives and fervent affections in his sacred work. (3:—7:) With great address and earnestness he recommended to them the collections for the poor Christians at Jerusalem, and showed the manifold advantages of such services. (8: 9:) At length, he more directly, yet evidently with great reluctance, contrasted his own gifts, labours, sufferings, and conduct, with the pretences of their false teachers; and showed himself "not a whit" inferior to any of the apostles. He then concluded with various admonitions and affectionate good wishes or prayers. (10:—13:)—These epistles may appear, to some readers, less interesting than several others; because they mainly refer to the peculiar circumstances of the Corinthian church; but in fact they are the more instructive on that very account: as directions and admonitions, suited to many of the more ordinary incidents of life, are communicated by them; which could not have been so advantageously adduced, in a more general discourse on the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.

The most remarkable circumstance in this epistle, is the confidence of the apostle in the goodness of his cause, and in the power of God to bear him out in it. Opposed, as he then was, by a powerful and sagacious party, whose authority, reputation, and interest were deeply concerned, and who were ready to seize on every thing, which could discredit him; it is wonderful to hear him, so firmly insist on his apostolical authority; and so unreservedly appeal to the miraculous powers, which he had exercised and conferred at Corinth. So far from shrinking from the contest, as afraid of some discovery being made, unfavourable to himself, or to the common cause; he, with great modesty and meekness indeed, but with equal boldness and decision, expressly declares that his opposers and despisers were "the ministers of Satan;" and menaces to inflict on them miraculous judgments, when as many of their deluded hearers had been brought to repentance, and re-established in the faith, as should in a reasonable time be influenced by the use of proper means. It is inconceivable, that a stronger internal testimony, not only of integrity, but of divine inspiration, can exist. Had there been any thing of imposture among the Christians, it was next to impossible, but such a conduct must have occasioned the disclosure of it.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes the Corinthians, 1, 2; and blesses God for consolations proportioned to his tribulations, and deliverance in extreme danger, lately vouchsafed to him; being intended for the benefit and comfort of others also, as well as an earnest to him of future deliverances, 3—11. He rejoices in the testimony of his conscience; and expresses his confidence of their attachment to him, which had induced him to purpose a journey to Corinth, 12—16. His delay of this journey did not arise from fickleness, 17, 18. He states the stability of the promises of God through Christ, and the security of believers, 19—22; and declares, that he had postponed his visit from lenity towards the Christians at Corinth, 23, 24.

[a]PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and [b]Timothy our brother, unto [c]the church of God which is at Corinth, with [d]all the saints which are in all [e]Achaia:

2 [f]Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 [g]Blessed be God, even [h]the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, [i]the Father of mercies, and [k]the God of all comfort;

4 Who [l]comforteth us in all our tribulation, [m]that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

5 For [n]as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, [o]so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

6 And [p]whether, be we afflicted, it is for you consolation and salvation which is [r]effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

7 And [q]our hope of you is steadfast, knowing

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1—7. The apostle joined his beloved Timothy with himself, in this 'Second Epistle to the Corinthians;' that he might establish his reputation and influence among them. Hence we learn that Timothy was come to him, from Ephesus, before he wrote it. (Note, 1 Cor. 16:10,11.) 'He calls Timothy his brother, probably, that he might not be despised for his youth.' Whitby. He addressed the epistle, not only to the church of God at Corinth, but also to "all the saints which are in all Achaia;" all professed Christians, who were to be considered as saints in the judgment of charity: yet formalists and hypocrites could not be included, or conjoined in those descriptions of character, and appropriation of privileges and promises, which cannot possibly belong to any except true Christians. (Marg. Ref. a—f. Note, Rom. 1:1—7. 1 Cor. 1:1—3.)—After the usual salutation, he abruptly broke forth in thanks and praises to God, "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and of all believers in him as "the Father of mercies" the Source and Author of every kind of mercy, to sinful men, abounding in mercy, and delighting in mercy: and as "the God of all comfort," the inexhaustible and everlasting Spring of peace, joy, and consolation to all who trusted in him.—'It is observable, that eleven of St. Pauls epistles begin with exclamations of joy, praise and thanksgiving. As soon as he thought of a Christian church, planted in one place or another; there seems to have been a flow of most lively affection accompanying the idea, in which all sensibility of his temporal afflictions, or theirs, were swallowed up; and the fullness of his heart must vent itself in such cheerful, exalted, and devout language.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, Eph. 1:3—that [r]as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant [s]of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, [t]insomuch that we despaired even of life:

9 But we had the [u]sentence of death in ourselves, [v]that we should not trust in ourselves, but [x]in God which raiseth the dead;

10 Who [y]delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us:

11 Ye also [z]helping together by prayer for us, [a]that, for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf. [Practical Observations.]

12 For [b]our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in [c]simplicity and [d]godly sincerity, [e]not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

13 For we write none other things unto you [f]than what ye read or acknowledge, and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

14 As also ye have acknowledged us [g]in part, [h]that we are your rejoicing, [i]even as ye also are ours [k]in the day of the Lord Jesus.

8. Phil. 1:3—6. Col. 1:3—8. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. 2 Thes. 1:3,4. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—Good tidings from the churches, which had been planted by him, always animated the apostle; and his heart was now full of satisfaction at what he had lately heard from Corinth by Titus. (Note, 7:5—7.) He therefore blessed God for animating and comforting him and his companions in labour, amidst all their troubles and persecutions; that they might be able to encourage others who were in trouble, by suggesting the same topics which God had made use of for their comfort. They could also assure their brethren of the sufficiency of divine consolations: seeing, in their own case they had experienced, that, as "the sufferings of Christ," or, sufferings for Christ's sake, and such as he endured, "abounded" in them; so their "consolations also abounded" in proportion, by the grace of Christ, and the joy of his salvation. (Marg. Ref. h—o.) When therefore they were afflicted; they considered their painful trials, as allotted them, in order to qualify them for their work, in promoting the consolation and salvation of their hearers. These blessings were efficaciously communicated to the souls of believers, by means of sufferings similar to those of the apostle: (Notes, 4:13—18. Rom. 5:3—5.) and the example of constancy, patience, and fortitude, which he and his brethren exhibited, helped to embolden their brethren for sufferings, and to animate them in persevering under them; (Note, Phil. 1:12—14.) and their experimental and sympathizing exhortations and instructions led them to behave properly under their trials, and to derive benefit from them. On the other hand, when the apostle and his helpers were comforted, their consolations were intended for the encouragement of the people also; as tending to illustrate the faithfulness of God to his promises, and his gracious readiness to support those who suffered for his sake; and by showing them how comfort might be found. These considerations both reconciled zealous Christians to sufferings, and rendered consolations doubly welcome. (Marg. Ref. p.) The apostle's hope, concerning the church at Corinth, in general, was rendered steadfast, by what he had heard, notwithstanding all that had been reprehensible: as it was evident, that with only few exceptions, they shared in his sorrows and uneasiness, and were willing to partake of "his sufferings for Christ's sake;" and therefore he was assured, that they would partake also of "his consolation in Christ."—Even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. (3) This style seems to be adopted under the New Testament, to distinguish "the one living and true God," from all other objects of worship, without excepting the Supreme Being of Deists and infidels: as that of "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," had been under the Old Testament, to distinguish JEHOVAH, from Baal, or Jupiter, or other imagined deities. (Notes, 1 Kings 18:1—21,36—39. 22:6.) None was the true God, under the Old Testament, but "the God of Abraham, &c." none under the New is the true God, but "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." V. 8—11. Some think that the apostle here referred to his sufferings at Lystra in Asia Minor; (Note, Acts 14:8—12.) but these occurred so many years before, that he would scarcely have thus mentioned them on this occasion. He seems to have written this Epistle from Phillippi, or at least when he was in Macedonia: Ephesus was the chief city of Asia, according to the sense in which the apostle always uses that word; (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) and, as he had just before been driven away from Ephesus, by Demetrius and the tumult excited by him, it is most probable, that he referred to the furious persecutions during that scene of riot and outrage. (Note, Acts 19:23—41.)—"It may be said, perhaps, that it does not appear from the history, that any danger threatened St. Paul's life, in the uproar at Ephesus, so imminent as that, from which in the epistle he represents himself to have been delivered. This matter, it is true, is not stated by the historian in form; but the personal danger of the apostle, we cannot doubt, must have been extreme, when the whole city was filled with confusion; when the populace had seized his companions; when, in the distraction of his mind, he insisted on coming forth amongst them; when the Christians who were about him would not suffer him; when his friends, certain of the chief of Asia, sent to him, desiring that he would not adventure himself into the tumult; when lastly he was obliged to quit, immediately, the place and the country; and "when the tumult was ceased, to depart into Macedonia." . . . Nothing could be more expressive of the circumstances, in which the history describes him to have been, at the time when the epistle purports to have been written, (than the verses under consideration.) . . It is the calm recollection of a mind, emerged from the confusion of instant danger. It is that devotion and solemnity of thought, which follows a recent deliverance. There is just enough of particularity, in the passage, to show that it is to be referred to the tumult at Ephesus.' Paley.—The apostle, however, had been weighed down with distress, which was "out of measure" grievous, from the concurrence of outward dangers and hardships, with inward disquietude, about the state of the churches: so that his burden was insupportable by any strength which he had previously possessed and he was by them led to despair, of being any longer preserved in life, to execute his plans of future usefulness. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) He even considered himself as a condemned person, "having the sentence of death" in himself, in that he judged his doom inevitable. Nor indeed had he any method of escape, by his own contrivance or efforts, or any confidence in himself: but he was brought to trust in God alone, who by his almighty power "raiseth the dead," and was therefore able to rescue him. Accordingly, God had delivered him from so imminent a peril of death, when it seemed even to have taken hold of him; and he still continued to deliver him from the rage of his enemies: he therefore was encouraged to trust, that he would yet deliver him, and preserve his life for future usefulness. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Notes, 1 Sam. 7:12. Acts 20:19—23. 2 Tim. 4:16—18.) This he expected in answer especially to the prayers of the Corinthians; who, he doubted not, had thus assisted him, and would continue to do so: that his life and term of usefulness being preserved, by the prayers of many persons, numbers might also unite in blessing God on his account, and for the benefit derived through his ministry. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Phil. 1:19,20.)—In all this he spoke in the plural number, as joining his fellow-labourers with him; but he doubtless meant it with special reference to his own case.

V. 12—14. Many of the Corinthians had been prejudiced against the apostle; and several of them still insinuated things to his disadvantage: but amidst this discouragement, and all his other trials, he possessed a constant source of joy and exultation, "in the testimony of his conscience." For though as a sinner he could only "rejoice and glory in Christ Jesus;" (Note, 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) yet as a believer he might rejoice and "glory" in his inward consciousness of being truly what he professed and appeared to be; and especially in that he had been enabled to exercise his sacred ministry, with "simplicity" and singleness of heart aiming at nothing but to glorify God by doing good to men; and in that "godly sincerity," that unadulterated integrity, which sprang from the fear and love of God, and approved itself to him. For he had not been warped by "fleshly wisdom," out of any concealed aim at his own interest reputation or authority, to use duplicity or dissimulation; but "by the grace of God" he had proceeded in forming and executing designs, planned and suited to promote the conversion of sinners, and the prosperity of the church; without regarding the reproaches and sufferings, to which he was constantly exposed on that account. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) This had been his habitual conduct, in every part of the world, ever since he had been called to profess and preach the gospel: but he had more abundantly manifested a disinterested, self-denying spirit, with "simplicity and godly sincerity," in his whole behaviour towards the church at Corinth; though they had been the first to suspect him, and accuse him of the contrary. (Note, 12:11—21.) He, however, now wrote no other things, than what they had read in the former Epistle, or than appeared to be the obvious meaning of his words: that is, he wrote to them in candour and artless simplicity, not covering his designs by specious and ambiguous language: nay, he wrote nothing but what most of them knew and acknowledged to be true, and he trusted would acknowledge to the end. (Marg. Ref. f. Note, 5:9—12.) They had indeed acknowledged him "in part," or "part of them," to have been the instrument of their conversion; and avowed that they rejoiced and gloried in their relation to him, and in his attention to them: and this was no more than corresponded to his rejoicing or glorying, in them, and on their account; which he trusted would be continued even unto "the day of the Lord Jesus," who should come to judge the world. V. 15, 16. Confiding in "the testimony of his conscience," and in the attachment of his brethren at Corinth, the apostle had purposed to visit them before that time; in the firm persuasion, that according to his earnest desires, they would derive "a second benefit" from him, for their establishment and consolation by grace. (Notes, Rom. 1:8—12. 15:22—29.) This shows, he had been only once at Corinth, at this time. (Note, 12:14,15.) He had intended to pass by Corinth in his way to Macedonia, and to call as he went, and then afterwards to return, and make a longer abode with them. This must have been his plan, for Corinth was out of his way into Macedonia: nor could it be supposed that he would come near that city, except in order to visit the Christians there. (Note, 1 Cor. 16:5—9.) Probably, he had given some other intimation of his purpose to the Corinthians, than that which is contained in the former epistle. He, however, saw reason to alter his plan, and to go into Macedonia by Troas. (Notes, Acts 20:1—6.)

V. 17—20. The apostle's opponents, at Corinth, seem to have urged his deviation from his first purpose, though made on the wisest considerations, and for the most benevolent purposes, as a proof that he was an inconstant and unstable man; who altered his conduct and doctrine, as circumstances required, and as suited his present conveniency. But would they believe such accusations against him? Would the Christians in that city ascribe his conduct to levity? Or would they conclude, that his purposes were formed, and changed, from worldly policy; so that he affirmed or denied, taught or retracted, as it best suited his quiet, safety, interest, or ambition? Some of them might indeed suspect him of this, and make it an argument against his doctrine; but, "as God," to whom he made his appeal, was "true," and faithful, so his word, or preaching to them, was not proposed in this fickle and wavering manner: he had never contradicted what he had once taught them, nor said "nay" in any point, after he had once said "yea" respecting it; but he had steadily persisted in one uniform testimony. So that the doctrine, preached by him, Silas, and Timothy, had been like its great Author, "the Son of God, Jesus the Messiah," who is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." (Marg. Ref. o—u. Note, Heb. 13:7,8.) Thus he and his fellow-labourers had proposed the salvation of Christ to the Corinthians, with the most entire consistency and unwavering steadfastness. They had not said first "yea," and then "nay," in these grand concerns; but had constantly declared, that all salvation was to be found in him alone; and that the covenant of grace, and all its engagements, were fully confirmed in him, to all who are found one with him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) In these doctrines, they had been most explicit and decided: though in various matters of less importance, they had used a prudent self-denying accommodation; and had been careful not to instruct the people in the deeper mysteries of Christianity, before they were able to bear them. (Note, 1 Cor. 3:1—9.) In this uniform and constant testimony the apostle persisted; because he knew, that "all the promises" of God to his people, throughout the Scripture, were made in and by Jesus Christ, and that all centred in him, the great Surety of the new covenant, according to which they are made to men; and that, by giving his Son to be the Saviour of sinners, God had verified his ancient predictions, demonstrated the divine original of the Scriptures, and given an assurance of fulfilling his largest promises to all believers. Thus he had, as it were, set his irrevocable Amen to the promises, which he had before given; he had confirmed them by the surest evidence which could be imagined; he had, indeed, pledged his own glory for the performance of them; his truth and perfections would be dishonoured, if they should fail of accomplishment: while the performance of them would every way redound to the glory of God, in the salvation of all believers, by means of the preaching of the apostles and other ministers.—'There is a yea, which is as a nay, and a nay, which is as yea: viz. when a man asserts, or denies a thing ironically: but the just man's yea is yea, and his nay is nay. When a man gives a bill of divorce to his wife, we try him ... three times, whether his nay be nay, and his yea yea.' Jewish writers in Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 5:33—37. Jam. 5:12. Rev. 3:14—16.)

When I ... was thus minded. (17) Τουτο βουλευομενος. Luke 14:31. John 12:10. Acts 5:33. 15:37. 27:39. Lightness.] Ελαφρια. Here only. V. 21, 22. The apostle's "established" belief of these truths, his reliance on these promises, and constancy in his ministry, were not the result of human wisdom, or outward teaching, or natural firmness and fortitude; but were effected by the power of God, who had brought the Corinthians also to a steadfast faith in Christ, and to fellowship with him. God had "anointed them," by his teaching and sanctifying grace; and so removed their natural blindness and prejudice against the truth. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 1 John 2:20—29. Rev. 1:4—6.) He had also "sealed them," both to mark them for his own, and to secure them to himself, by enstamping the divine image upon their souls, through the new-creatin power of his Spirit; whose graces and holy consolations were the "earnest," pledge, and foretaste in their hearts, of the heavenly inheritance, to which they were called. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 5:5—8. Rom. 8:14—17,18—23.) From these causes the apostle derived his constancy and confidence in preaching the Gospel; and believers were influenced by them to hold fast their faith without wavering.—Some indeed interpret "the anointing," of miraculous powers, and "the seal," of the sacraments; but without any satisfactory proof: but it is far more consistent with the tenor of Scripture, to explain "the anointing" of such divine communications as belong to Christians in general, and of which none else partake.—Sacraments are but outward seals of the covenant, and neither distinguish believers from others, nor secure salvation to all who partake of them; (Note, Rom. 4:9—12.) and miraculous powers have been exercised by very wicked men, and have long since ceased in the church: but the renewal of the divine image on the soul, in sanctification, and "the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit," form through every age a seal and earnest, of a far more distinguishing and permanent nature. V. 23, 24. Having thus vindicated his conduct and doctrine from the charge of inconsistency; the apostle, in the most solemn manner, called God to witness the truth of what he was about to assert: he desired that he would testify for him, or against him, as he saw the case to be; and he could expect nothing but awful judgments "on his soul," if he spake falsely after such an appeal. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 11:7—12,28—31. Rom. 9:1—3. Phil. 1:7,8.) With this most awful introduction, which is a peculiarly solemn oath, on a highly important occasion, (Note, Ex. 20:7.) he declared, that he had postponed his visit to Corinth, in order to spare them those censures and miraculous judgments, which he feared would have been unavoidable, if he had gone thither immediately on leaving Ephesus. He had not then received any information what effect his former epistle had produced: he was aware, that time would be required to bring their affairs into a better state; and he thought it more advisable to wait a little longer, that he might at length come, not "with a rod, but in love and in the spirit of meekness." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2:1—4. 10:7—11. 12:17—21. 13:1—4. 1 Cor. 4:18—21, v. 21.) He did not mean by this to claim any despotic authority in dictating to them, as of himself, what they should believe: or even to insist, in a dogmatical manner, on their receiving every particular which he taught them by the command of Christ. He had not thus usurped dominion, or "lorded it over them, in respect of the faith," as the clause may be rendered; but had acted hitherto, and was still disposed to act, with gentleness, and forbearance, as a "helper of their joy" and consolation in Christ, by his instructions, admonitions, and counsels. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27. Phil. 1:21—26. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) Yet he deemed it necessary, as the servant and representative of Christ, to act with authoritative decision, and even sharpness, against such as perverted the gospel and corrupted its doctrines; for "by faith" believers stood accepted with God, and were enabled to stand steadfast amidst trials and temptations. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 5:5—8. Rom. 5:1,2. 1 Cor. 15:1,2. Eph. 6:14—17. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) Those persons, therefore, who perverted the faith, by false doctrines, and corrupt practices, were about to take from true Christians that support, by which they stood; to cause them to fall into various evils; to mar their joy; and to do them immense mischief, if not opposed. As "helpers of their joy," therefore, the apostle and his friends must take a decided part against these enemies to their holiness and comfort.—The tenet, that we are at first indeed justified by faith, but are preserved in a justified state by works, is diametrically opposite to this apostolical decision.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The church of God is his peculiar residence, in which he displays his glory and communicates his grace: all therefore who belong to it are "saints;" devoted and conformed unto him; and should act, as it "becometh saints." Many persons, however, of a different character intrude among them; but "grace and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ," belong to the saints alone.—Those who through grace have believed in Christ should ever be ready to bless and praise our God, even amidst sharp sufferings. He is "the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort;" nor can we expect too much from his infinite compassion and love; or too highly celebrate the praises of what he has already done for us.—We must indeed expect tribulations: they are needful, profitable, and unavoidable; and they, who have been most honoured by the Lord Jesus, have also been most conformed to him in sufferings: but he proportions his consolations to the troubles of those who simply trust and serve him; and he thus renders them capable of "comforting others, by the comfort with which they are comforted of God." The afflictions and consolations of ministers, especially, are often intended for the sake of the people, as well as themselves; that, by their own example, experience, counsels, and exhortations, they may promote "the consolation and salvation of others also." For these blessings are commonly brought home to the hearts of men, and the word of God is rendered "effectual" for every saving purpose, by means of trials and afflictions: and the minister, who is a stranger to sufferings and divine consolations, can seldom duly sympathize with the mourners, counsel the tempted, encourage the dejected, or even "bear with the infirmities of the weak." This should reconcile us to our sorrows and trials, and teach us to seek benefit from them: and it should animate us to more earnest prayer, for proportionable grace and consolation, that we may exhibit an edifying example under afflictions: for assuredly we shall rejoice in heaven on account of the sharpest sufferings, which have been rendered subservient to our salvation, and that of any of those, whom our gracious Lord owns as his friends, brethren, and near relations. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. John 15:12—16. Heb. 2:10—13.) We may form "a steadfast hope" of those professed Christians, who sympathize with the afflicted servants of Christ, and are willing to suffer for his sake; being confident that, as they "partake of the sufferings, they shall also share the consolations" of his gospel.—The Lord, sometimes, permits his children to be pressed "out of measure, even above strength," and to be driven almost to despair of deliverance; that, having "the sentence of death in themselves," they may learn, more simply, to trust in his almighty power, and all-sufficient grace. This often occurs in the concerns of their own souls: inward temptations and conflicts, connected with outward difficulties, fill them with desponding fears and anxieties; they are made to feel that infinite mercy and omnipotent grace alone can preserve them from the most terrible downfalls, nay, even from final ruin. Thus they are driven from self-confidence, and learn to cast themselves wholly on God: and when he hath repeatedly "rescued them from so great a death," they admire his truth, power, and love; and are encouraged to hope, that he will yet deliver them, and make them victorious over all their enemies. (Notes, 12:7—10. P. O. Job 9.) In such scenes of conflict and terror, especially, we feel that we need the prayers of our brethren: and we ought thence to learn to pray for all who are tried and tempted, as well as to unite in thanksgivings with such as have received gracious deliverances. Thus all our trials and mercies, being mixed with prayers and praises, will terminate in the glory of God, and in our own and each other's spiritual advantage. And even the most afflicted Christian, who is fully assured of eternal felicity, ought to desire and value life; as long as God is pleased to make him useful to the souls of men, and an instrument, either by active service or patient suffering, of promoting his glory.

V. 12—16. If we would have comfort amidst troubles, reproaches, suspicions, and slanders, we must seek for "the rejoicing in the testimony of our conscience." Indeed, provided we are upright in our professed repentance, and faith in Christ and his atoning blood; and careful to serve the Lord "in simplicity and godly sincerity," according to our places in his church and in the community; and "if we have our conversation in the world, not by fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God;" we may greatly exult in these evidences of our acceptance in Christ, and our adoption into the family of God; and may take this comfort, as an abundant counterpoise to every calumny, and even as a sure anticipation of the favourable sentence of our Judge, in the great day of account. (Notes, Acts 23:1—5. 24:10—21. Rom. 8:14—17.) Yet we should not wonder, if we are suspected by those persons to whom, and for those actions in which, we have behaved most conscientiously. Sometimes "simplicity and godly sincerity" may require that line of conduct, which, to superficial or prejudiced observers, will have a contrary appearance: and, on many occasions, a man may be deemed inconstant, because he will not go the whole length of a party, and coincide with them in their follies, mistakes, and sins. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) We should, however, leave our characters in the hands of God; only using proper means to clear them, when the credit of the gospel, or our usefulness, calls for it.—Ministers, and the people who have profited by their labours, ought now to rejoice in each other, as they may expect to do at the last day. Whatever interferes with this reciprocal joy and affection, should be guarded against: and believers should be very careful, not to grieve, by neglect and unkindness

CHAPTER II.

The apostle shows his purpose, of not coming to Corinth in heaviness; and states the grief with which he had written his former epistle, 1—4. He directs the Corinthians to forgive and restore the incestuous person; as he had forgiven him in Christ's name, 5—11. His uneasiness, at not finding Titus at Troas, had induced him to go directly into Macedonia, 12, 13. He blesses God for the joy and triumph, which had attended his faithful preaching of the gospel in every place, which he distinguishes from that of "many who corrupt the word of God," 14—17.

BUT [a]I determined this with myself, [b]that I would not come again to you in heaviness.

2 For [c]if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me?

3 And [d]I wrote this same unto you, [e]lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom [f]I ought to rejoice; [g]having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

4 For [h]out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; [i]not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

5 But if [k]any have caused grief, he hath not [l]grieved me, but in part; that I may not over charge you all.

6 Sufficient to such a man is this [m]punishment, [n]which was inflicted of many.

7 So that contrariwise, [o]ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be [p]swallowed up with [q]overmuch sorrow.

8 Wherefore I beseech you, [r]that ye would confirm your love toward him.

9 For to this end also did I write, [s]that I might know the proof of you, [t]whether ye be obedient in all things.

10 To [u]whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the [v]person of Christ; those faithful friends, to whom, under God, they owe their eternal salvation; and who are concerned for their best welfare, with all the tenderness of affectionate parents. And ministers should desire to visit their beloved people from whom they have been separated, not only for the comfort of their company, but especially that the people may have still further benefit from them.

11 Lest [w]Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

V. 17—24. It is very unjust and uncandid, to ascribe every alteration, in a man's purpose or conduct, to lightness, instability, duplicity, or carnal policy; especially when his general character bears another stamp, and when there may be good reasons for the change which has taken place. If we are thus unjustly censured or suspected, we must make our appeal to God: yet it behooves us to be steady and constant in our conduct and profession, as far as we can, that we may avoid "the appearance of evil." This is peculiarly incumbent on the preachers of "the Son of God, Jesus Christ," "the AMEN, the true and faithful Witness;" "in whom all the promises of God" are given and confirmed, in the most steadfast and unchangeable manner, "to the glory of God by us." What he has already done leaves no room for us to doubt the exact performance of every promise to all believers. His word, covenant, and dispensations are so ordered, as to give encouragement to the weakest faith. We may not only say, "Hath he spoken, and will he not do it?" Has he interposed with an oath, and will he now fail those, who "flee for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before them?" But "he that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" Yet unbelief excludes men from the blessing; and many believers come short of comfort, because they are distrustful, and "of little faith." If then, we have been "established in Christ" with these ancient believers, it is God that has done this great thing for us. The sacred unction of his grace, the seal and earnest of his Spirit, and those holy tempers and gracious fruits, which attend our confidence and consolations, secure us from delusion in so important a matter, and distinguish genuine holy experience from all the joys of hypocrites, enthusiasts, and apostates.—We should never "call God to witness," except on important occasions, and in the most solemn manner; when other ways of ascertaining the truth, and avouching our integrity, are insufficient, and momentous concerns are at stake: yet the example of the apostle, under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, fully proves that solemn oaths, in some cases, are both lawful and expedient. "The record of God" will be on our souls, either to justify or condemn us: he "will not hold those guiltless, who take his name in vain;" and we ought so to act, that, in all ordinary cases, "our yea, yea, nay, nay," may be sufficient to ensure credit to our testimony. (Notes, Matt. 5:33—37. Jam. 5:12.)—If the apostle did not exercise "dominion over the faith" of Christians, we should by no means "call men master," or "father," or implicitly submit to their decisions and assertions; nor should we ever attempt "to lord it," in this manner, "over" any part of "God's heritage." We ought to remember, that ministers are the "helpers of the joy" of believers; and we should seek the increasing comfort of our brethren, with prudent and persevering tenderness and affection. Yet as Christians "stand by faith" only, and all their joys must flow from the vigorous, uninterrupted, and authorized exercise of that leading principle; so every thing that tends to weaken, mislead, and subvert the faith of professed Christians, must be watched against and opposed. Sometimes therefore genuine love, and a wise desire of helping the joy of believers, will dictate sharp rebukes and decided censures of those, who would deceive and corrupt them. It is, however, best to use more lenient measures, as far as there is a prospect of success; and to avoid even the appearance of severity, if it can be done consistently with prudence and faithfulness.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle had determined in himself, that he would not, if it could be avoided, make his intended visit to Corinth till he could go with comfort to himself and his brethren in that city. He expected that he should prevail with them by his epistles, to exclude such as remained refractory, and also recover many who had been drawn aside: and then he would be able to go among them, without that "heaviness" and distress of mind, which he must have felt, if constrained to re-establish his authority by censures and punishments. When he had before visited Corinth, he had received and communicated joy; and he was not willing to come the second time in a sorrowful manner. Even his steady friends must have shared the sorrow, if he had been forced to exercise severity; and so his journey must have been distressing to them and to him. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Note, 1:23,24.) He had therefore written before, and he now wrote again, in order that the prevailing abuses might be redressed; lest he should receive sorrow from the very persons, in whose holy and comfortable walking he ought to have rejoicing: and he was confident that they would approve of this plan; as he would not allow himself to doubt, but that "his joy was the joy of them all." The apostle certainly knew that this admitted of exceptions: but it was kind and prudent in him, to express his favourable opinion of the church in general; and to represent the disaffected party to be so small, as not to bear any proportion to his friends and adherents. He had indeed written the former epistle, especially those parts of it which contained rebukes, in great affliction, and constrained by "the anguish of his heart," at hearing many distressing reports concerning them; and he had wept abundantly at the painful necessity imposed on him: yet, he had not intended by it to cause them needless grief: but rather to convince them of his "more abundant love" to them, by performing this most self-denying and distressing act of Christian friendship; even contrary to their inclinations, and at the hazard of incurring their displeasure. (Notes, Lev. 19:17. Prov. 9:7—9.)

V. 5—11. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5.) The crime of the incestuous Corinthian, and the connivance at it by the church, had peculiarly troubled the apostle: but he had borne only a part of this grief, as many had shared it with him. This he mentioned, that he might not charge too much criminality on them, or be supposed to intimate that the Christians at Corinth had all alike been culpable in that matter. As to the offender himself, let the rebuke and excommunication which had been inflicted on him by "the many," (or by the church and its ministers, acting according to the sentence and command of the apostle,) suffice for his punishment. It appeared to have had a salutary effect: and therefore, instead of further severity, they ought "to forgive and encourage him;" lest overmuch sorrow should unfit him for his duty, or give Satan an opportunity of tempting him to hard thoughts of God and religion, to apostacy, or even to despair, which might swallow him up and occasion his ruin. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) The apostle would therefore now intreat for the offender, as he before protested against him: and he besought them to confirm their love to him, by restoring him to communion with them, and by sympathizing in his sorrow; that he might be assured their censures, though apparently severe, had proceeded from the same friendly and loving disposition.—Indeed he had written so decidedly on this subject to make trial of their prompt obedience to his apostolical authority; and their conduct had satisfied him that they were disposed to regard it in all things. He was therefore confident of their discretion; and ready, not only in this, but in similar instances, to concur with them in receiving again into their communion, as penitent and pardoned, those who had been laid under the censures of the church: this he would do for their benefit, in the presence of Christ, as representing his "person," and as acting by his authority. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Notes, Matt. 16:19. John 20:19—23.) He was also the more desirous of thus concurring in the reconciliation of the offender, lest Satan, their subtle adversary, should obtain some advantage by their delay: either by tempting the offender to despondency; by bringing an evil report on Christians as rigorous and unforgiving; or by discouraging other offenders, deterring men from embracing the gospel, exciting further divisions in the church, or otherwise preventing the success of the gospel. For he was not ignorant of the manifold "devices" of that enemy; and by what varied machinations he endeavoured to deceive and prejudice men's minds, and to disturb the peace of the church. (Marg. Ref. u.)—It is observable, that the apostle carefully avoided mentioning the name of this scandalous offender.

V. 12, 13. After Paul had been driven from Ephesus, he went to Troas, in his way to Macedonia; intending to remain for a short time in that city, to preach the gospel, of which a very favourable opportunity presented itself. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Acts 20:1—6.) But, not meeting Titus there, according to his expectation, and having received no tidings from Corinth, that he could not comfortably continue at Troas. He therefore hastened into Macedonia to meet Titus, which he accordingly did; and his report had determined him to write this second epistle, and then to proceed leisurely, through the churches of Macedonia, before he visited Corinth. V. 14—17. The happy turn given to the affairs of the Corinthians; the confidence which the apostle entertained of success as to that perplexing business, in which he had been engaged respecting them; and his usefulness in other places, caused him to break forth in "thanks to God," amidst all his difficulties and distresses. He had indeed sharp conflicts to sustain, but the Lord gave him such multiplied victories, that he went from city to city as a triumphant conqueror, in the cause of Christ. And as in triumphs abundance of odours were used; so the name and salvation of Jesus, ("as ointment poured forth," Note, Cant. 1:3.) was a "sweet odour" diffused by him in every place: so that he, and his fellow-labourers, were pleasing and acceptable to God, by their testimony to Christ, and through his merits, as a sweet-smelling savour; (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, Gen. 8:20—22, v. 21. Eph. 5:1,2. Phil. 4:14—20, v. 18.) nor was this the case only in respect of those who were saved by their means, but also in those who perished through unbelief: for in both respects God was glorified by their preaching. To the one, indeed, their doctrine was an occasion of aggravated condemnation, through the depraved state of their hearts, and their enmity to it or perversion of it; even as costly odours are sometimes pernicious, nay fatal, to diseased persons. But to the other, their doctrine was as a delightful odour, which exhilarates the spirits, renews health, and prolongs life: for, loving and embracing the salutary message, they found it to be unto life and salvation. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Luke 2: 33—35. John 3:19—21. Rom. 9:30—33. 1 Pet. 2:7,8.) As, however, such infinitely important consequences were connected with the sacred ministry; and as faithfulness alone could render it acceptable and honourable to God, or profitable to men; who, of the human race, could of himself be "sufficient" for such a service? Or who would dare to engage in it without trembling? (Note, 3:4—6.)—This obliquely hinted at the self-sufficiency of the Corinthian teachers: but they were more immediately intended, when he spake of "many" who sophisticated the word of God, as dishonest vintners do their wine; when they preserve something of the colour and taste, but dilute it, or mix it up with other liquids which weaken it, prevent its efficacy, or even render it poisonous, in order to enhance their profits. Thus, these teachers preserved some important truths in their preaching, to render it more specious: but they corrupted it by human inventions, philosophical conjectures, or antinomian opinions: till it became inefficacious, and even pernicious, to the souls of men. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Note, 11:13—15. Col. 2:8,9.) This they did, to pay court to the prejudices and inclinations of their followers; that they might establish their own influence, and gratify their avarice and ambition. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1—3.)—Learned men have differed greatly in opinion, about these corrupters of the gospel; whether they were Judaizing Christians, or Gentile converts, or heretics as the Gnostics in particular were: but, beyond all doubt, there were corrupters of the gospel at that time, of different descriptions, who perverted it in various ways. The apostle, however, was conscious that he was not actuated by any carnal or selfish motives, nor left to adopt and propagate delusions: on the contrary, in the most entire "sincerity and simplicity," as sent by God and serving him; as influenced by his grace, and as acting in his sight; he spake of Christ and his salvation, in every place: without at all consulting his own interest, or the inclination of his hearers, except in order to their profit. (Notes, 1:12—14. 4:1,2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. We should always give pain reluctantly, even when it must be done: for, if we are of a truly Christian spirit, we shall share the grief which we occasion.—It is a common case for faithful ministers, to "have sorrow from those, of whom they ought to rejoice;" and to be deprived of comfort even from the seals of their ministry, through the necessity to which they are reduced of making them sorrowful: whereas "their joy ought to be the joy of all" the people. That part of an affectionate minister's work, which gives most offence, is often performed by him with "great affliction and anguish of heart, and with many tears," and by a kind of painful constraint. So far is he from intending to grieve his beloved people, that he does violence to his own feelings, and ventures their displeasure, from "his abundant affection to them:" and that he may, even against their will, preserve them, if possible, from the dangers, to which the artifices of deceivers, and their own inexperience, expose them. Ministers of this spirit and character will be careful "not to overcharge their brethren," and not to condemn them harshly or indiscriminately. They do not desire to magnify their own trials, or to multiply their complaints: they would have no censure employed, or continued in force, without evident necessity; they are ready to show kindness, and speak comfort to the penitent; and take pleasure in restoring the most grievous offenders "in the spirit of meekness," when it can be done consistently with the honour of the gospel, and the purity of the church; (Notes, Gal. 6:1—5 Jude 22—25.) and they will exhort others to assure the offenders of their love, when salutary rebukes or discipline have had their proper effect.—No man indeed has a right to exercise dominion over the faith of his brethren: but, as far as ministers act according to the commandments of Christ,

CHAPTER III.

To obviate the charge of self-commendation; the apostle shows that the conversion of the Corinthians was a sufficient attestation of Christ given to his ministry, 1—3. He ascribes all his sufficiency and success to God, 4, 5; and shows the glory of the gospel to be superior to that of the law, 6—11: declaring that his plain speaking accorded to the nature of his ministry, which was less obscure than that of Moses, 12—14; stating the blindness of the Jews, which would be removed when they turned to the Lord, 15, 16; and describing the liberty and progressive holiness, which arose from faith in Christ, and the illumination of the Holy Spirit, 17, 18.

DO we [a]begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, [b]epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?

2 Ye [c]are our epistle written [d]in our hearts, [e]known and read of all men:

3 Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be [f]the epistle of Christ, [g]ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of [h]the living God; [i]not in tables of stone, [k]but in fleshly tables of the heart.

4 And [l]such trust have we through Christ to [m]God-ward:

5 Not [n]that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; [o]but our sufficiency is of God;

6 Who also [p]hath made us able ministers of [q]the New Testament; [r]not of the letter, but of spirit: [s]for the letter killeth, [t]but the spirit [u]giveth life.

they are authorized to expect obedience from the people: and they may sometimes properly make trial of it; yet they should always be ready to express a forgiving disposition. When church censures, ministerial rebukes, or the reconciliation of offenders, are regulated according to the word of Christ, and as in his presence; they are valid, even as if he were present in person to ratify them.—We should always be upon our guard, "lest Satan get an advantage against us:" that subtle enemy knows how to avail himself of our mistakes, whether of ill-timed lenity, or needless severity; he buoys up men with presumption, or urges them to despair; he represents the ministers and professors of the gospel, as licentious, or as over strict, just as appearances vary; he raises contradictory slanders, to prejudice men against the truth, or to destroy the peace of the church. We should therefore study, by attention to the Scriptures, by careful observation, by watching our own experiences, by conferring with our brethren, and above all by fervent prayer, to get acquainted with "his devices," that we may be competent to counteract them.

V. 12—17. It is perhaps impossible in this present state, to separate fervent active zeal from an over-anxious solicitude! and though we should not yield to any thing, which takes us off from our present services; yet it may sometimes be profitable for us to recollect, that even St. Paul could have "no rest in his spirit" in preaching at Troas, through his earnest desire to learn the state of the Corinthian church.—If, however, our hearts be right with God, our disquietudes will terminate in thanksgivings, our conflicts in victories and triumphs; and the labours of the faithful minister will be accepted and graciously rewarded by our God, whether his hearers be saved, or perish. But how dreadful is the case of numbers, to whom the blessed gospel itself becomes "the savour of death unto death;" and the faithful and affectionate endeavours of ministers, for their salvation, serve only to seal and aggravate their condemnation! (Notes, Is. 6:9,10. 2 Pet. 3:14—16.) This is a painful thought to the servants of Christ: as they would gladly be "the savour of life unto life" to all, who come within the sound of their voice, or who by any means can be made acquainted with their doctrine.—But how should the consideration of the consequences, which must follow on our preaching, to ourselves and our hearers, make us shrink back, as it were, under the consciousness of unworthiness and insufficiency! especially as so many still adulterate and "corrupt the word of God," to their own ruin, and that of their deluded followers. If this was the case even while the apostles were living, how is it at present? and what would holy Paul's verdict be in this day, concerning an immense proportion of professed teachers and rulers in the Christian church? May we then inquire how the case is with each of us; may we carefully watch ourselves in this matter; and seek the testimony of our consciences, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that "as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God, so we may speak in Christ!" May the Lord also send forth very many faithful and able ministers into his church, and stop the mouths of all false teachers: and may every Christian learn to distinguish between genuine shepherds, and all kinds of wolves and foxes in sheep's clothing! (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Matt. 7:13—20.)

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—3. (Note, 2:14—17.) The apostle's opponents would be ready to censure the foregoing declaration, as another instance of his "commending himself;" for it is probable, they alleged that his former epistle contained some examples of this kind: but could the Christians at Corinth in general suspect him of being actuated by so mean and selfish a motive? Did he or his friends need any human testimony to their character? Was there any occasion for other churches to give them recommendatory letters to the Corinthian church? Or that the Corinthians should thus testify to their character, for the satisfaction of other churches? This indeed was the case of some, who had come in among them with an ambiguous character and mission, and who wanted and received such recommendations; but the apostle had no need of them. For the Corinthians themselves were his "epistle of commendation;" it was "written in their hearts," (as some read it, perhaps without sufficient authority from manuscripts or copies,) and legible in their lives; so that men of every nation and language might read and understand the import of it. Or, he so valued this testimonial, and so loved them as the seals of his ministry, that he had this epistle, as it were, engraven in his heart. For they were "manifestly declared to all men, to be Christ's epistle," recommending his apostle's ministry, which he had employed him in framing. This was not written with ink, on paper, but by the Spirit of the living God; nor engraven, as the law of the ten commandments was, by the finger of God on tables of stones, but "on fleshly tables of the heart;" their hearts having been softened, humbled and prepared to receive this divine impression, by the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. a—k. Notes, Ex. 24:12—14. 31:18. 32:15—19. 34:1—4,27. Deut. 4:13. 10:1—5. Ez. 11:17—20.)—"In your hearts, made soft and pliable, and ready to obey the word, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, according to the promise. Ez. 11:19. 36:26.' Whitby. (Note, Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13.)—As the apostle therefore firmly believed them to be true Christians; surely, they could not doubt that he was the apostle of Christ: their conversion sufficiently recommended him and his doctrine, and he needed no other testimonial. The language here used is remarkable. "The epistle of Christ, ministered by us." Christ wrote it, by the apostle, as his amanuensis:—"written ... with the Spirit of the living God." What the Spirit does, is done by Christ. (Note, Rev. 2:6,7, v. 7.)

V. 4—6. The preceding considerations gave the apostle "such confidence, through Christ," in his cause and in those things which pertained to God, that he spake to the Christians at Corinth concerning himself and his ministry, in that bold manner which they censured. Not that he or his associates professed any sufficiency for so important a trust and work, as "of themselves," or by any natural wisdom, ability or good disposition, above other men: on the contrary, they were conscious, that they could not in any respect execute their ministry, faithfully or successfully, if left to themselves that they could not 'think a good thought' without divine grace: they therefore made no estimation of themselves in this great concern; but allowed and were deeply sensible that all their sufficiency was of God. (Marg. Ref. l—o Note, John 1:16.) He indeed had made them "able, faithful,' and successful ministers of the New Testament, or covenant, which was ratified with believers through the blood of Christ, and ensured to them all spiritual and eternal blessings: and, while they gave him all the glory, they could not but know what he had done for them and by them; and they must not shun to speak with authority and decision in this cause. Nor had they been the ministers only of a mere letter, but of a doctrine, which was accompanied by the operation of the Holy Spirit to render it efficacious: for the mere letter would have proved an occasion of condemnation and death to the hearers; but the Spirit gave life and salvation to them through the gospel. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Notes, Rom. 1:13—16. 7:5,6. 10:12—17. 1 Cor. 1:20—25. 2:3—5. 3:4—9.)—This is commonly understood restrictively, of the legal and evangelical dispensations contrasted with each other, and the context seems to favour this interpretation: yet it is not satisfactory, as proposed in a general manner; for the Mosaic dispensation was not a killing letter to all who were under it; nor is the gospel, in all cases, attended by the life-giving Spirit. But the Mosaic dispensation derived all its saving efficacy from the gospel, to which it referred; and, after the publication of Christianity, it became altogether "a killing letter" to those who cleaved to it. (Notes, Ga. 4:21—31. 5.

7 But if [u]the ministration of death, [x]written and engraven in stones, [y]was glorious, so [z]that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance, [a]which glory was to be done away;

8 How shall not [b]the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious?

9 For if [c]the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth [d]the ministration of righteousness [e]exceed in glory.

10 For even that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.

11 For [f]if that which is done away was glorious, [h]much more that which remaineth is glorious.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope, [i]we use great [j]plainness of speech;

13 And not as Moses, [k]which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel [l]could not steadfastly look [m]to the end of that which is abolished:

14 But [n]their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament; [o]which veil is done away in Christ.

15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, [p]the veil is upon their heart.

1—6.) For the gospel was "the ministration of the Spirit," and the only doctrine through which life and salvation were communicated to sinners; as the apostle shows more fully in the next verses. The moral law indeed is universally "found unto death," to all who remain under it; but the ceremonies and types, together with the prophecies, gave ancient believers a general or indistinct discovery of mercy and grace, through the promised Saviour: yet these institutions, to unbelievers, were a mere lifeless form, which left them under the condemnation of the moral law, and even added to it. (Notes, Rom. 5:20,21. 7:1—12.) But then it was to be remembered, that the gospel itself, and its ministers, are "a savour of death unto death" to unbelievers; who often make the same formal use of some evangelical truths, and an attendance on Christian ordinances, which the Jews did of the Mosaic ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders: and in this way and in many others, "the letter," even of the New Testament, "kills;" and it only gives life, when accompanied "by the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." (Notes, 2:14—17. Rom. 8:1—4.)—To understand "the letter and the spirit," of a literal and an allegorical interpretation of Scripture, is both foreign to the apostle's argument, and also palbably absurd and extremely dangerous. Some parts of Scripture are allegorical, and must be so interpreted: but surely laws, doctrines, promises, exhortations, and historical facts, must be literally understood by all who do not purposely seek to misunderstand them!

V. 7—11. The Corinthians undervalued the authority of the apostle, as "the minister of Christ;" but he here showed them, how far the ministry of the New Testament excelled that of the Old. The moral law alone "was written and engraven in stones;" and it was properly the "ministration of death and condemnation," by leaving every transgressor under the curse denounced by it: (Note, Gal. 3:6—14.) but the unbelieving Jews turned the whole Mosaic dispensation into a mere covenant of works, to their own condemnation. Both "the holy, just, and good law," and the ritual institution as connected with it and introductory to the gospel, "were glorious:" the whole had the stamp of divinity upon it; and was expressive of the justice, holiness, and truth of God. (Marg. Ref. x, y. c. g. Note, Deut. 32:4.) As an emblem of this, "the face of Moses," when he came down from the mount, with the tables of the law, and the ratification of the Sinai covenant, shone in such a manner, that the Israelites could not steadfastly look at it: which caused him to wear a veil in their presence. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, Ex. 34:27—35.) This represented the glory of that dispensation, which was to be abolished by the introduction of the new covenant in Christ. (Note, Heb. 8:7—13.) If then, the ministry of that dispensation, which, considered apart from the gospel, could only leave men under the sentence of death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal, was so glorious, and imparted such honour to Moses: how could it be supposed, that the ministry of the New Covenant, through which especially the life-giving sanctifying Spirit is given to sinners, as the seal and earnest of eternal life, should not be glorious, and honourable to those entrusted with it? (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.) If that ministry, which in itself tended only to condemnation, contained such a display of the divine glory, as rendered the exercise of it honourable; how should not that ministry, by which condemned sinners are taught the way of righteousness, through faith in Christ, and which contains so full and complete a discovery of the glory and harmony of God's perfections, confer far greater honour on the apostles, who were employed to preach it to the world? (Marg. Ref. d—f.) Indeed, the glory of the law, and of the legal dispensation, was so eclipsed by the glory of the gospel which immensely excelled it, as, in this respect, to be comparatively nothing: and after the publication of Christianity, the Mosaic dispensation lost all its reflected glory and divine authority, and became a lifeless letter and form, to those who rejected Christ. (Note, Gal. 4:8—11.) If then, that which was intended to be temporary, and at length to be abolished, had been glorious when Moses promulgated it; much more must the gospel, which was intended to continue till the end of the world, as the last and most complete discovery of the divine truth and will, be glorious in itself, and honourable to those who were entrusted to reveal it to mankind. (Marg. Ref. g, h.)—'It should be understood, that the law,' (of ten commandments,) 'is not considered simply, but as connected with the ministry of Moses, ... and as apart and distinct from the gospel; in which respect, it may be said to have been abolished, when the ministration of Moses was abolished. But thou wilt say, is the ministration of Moses abolished in this respect? By no means: for men must always be prepared for the gospel, by the preaching of the law. But this I say, that the ministration of Moses is in all cases abolished, when the manifest grace of the gospel succeeds to the figurative preaching of the law.' Beza. (Note, John 1:17.)—From this argument of the apostle, it is generally concluded, that the false teachers at Corinth judaized: but it has before appeared, that their leading errors were of a different nature; though some might be prone to run into that extreme. The apostle, however, seems to have principally intended "to magnify his office;" and to show from the example of Moses, that the ministry of the New Testament was honourable, in proportion to the superior glory of that dispensation: and that he, as immediately entrusted with the important stewardship of the divine mysteries, as an inspired apostle, and as faithful in this service, had a right to demand respect and deference to his authority; which his opponents, whoever they were, refused him, and instructed their followers to refuse him.

V. 12—16. Having this hope and confidence, that he was made of God "an able minister" of that glorious dispensation by which "the gift of righteousness," and the "life-giving Spirit" were conferred on men: the apostle used great plainness, liberty, and boldness of speech: declaring without reserve "the whole counsel of God," and faithfully reproving what was false and sinful, as one who had authority and sufficiency from God. His doctrine was not hid in obscurity, or ambiguity, or under types and shadows, as the legal dispensation had been; of which the veil on the face of Moses was a figure or emblem. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Note, Ex. 35:29—35.) As this covering concealed the lustre of his countenance, so the obscurity of that dispensation concealed its real glory; and the Israelites were unable to look steadfastly to Christ, the great End, Scope, and Substance, of those ceremonies which were shortly to be abolished. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, Rom 10:1—4. Col. 2:16,17. Heb. 9:1—14.) Even believers had only indistinct and transient glimpses of that glorious Object (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and unbelievers looked no further than the outward institution, except as they expected a temporal deliverer and King. Thus the minds of the Jews were generally blinded by pride, prejudice, and carnal lusts; which formed a veil over their hearts, in addition to that which was thrown over the Mosaic law; and this veil remained to close their minds, against the truth, even after the light of the gospel had shown the real import of the legal ceremonies: so that, when the Jews read the Old Testament, the veil upon their hearts prevented them from understanding its true meaning, or deriving any spiritual benefit from it. For "the veil is done away only in Christ;" his doctrine removes it from the written word: but faith in him, and the teaching or illumination of the Spirit, must remove it from the mind and heart, and enable the believer to perceive the spiritual meaning of the types, prophecies, and promises of the whole Scripture. For want of this, the Jews at that time, (and their awful case is the same to this day,) had "a veil on their hearts," when the law of Moses was read among them; nor could all their diligence, attention, or attachment to the law, enable them to understand it in a saving manner. But when any individuals among them were converted to the Lord Jesus, this veil was removed from their minds: and this will be the case respecting the nation in general, when they shall, according as it is predicted by all the prophets, believe in their long rejected Messiah. V. 17, 18. The preceding argument shows, that the Lord Jesus "is that Spirit," or animating soul, which gives life to the letter of the Scriptures, and to belivers. (6) Without him, doctrines, promises, ordinances, and commandments, are a mere lifeless body of religion; the power and life of all and of every part must wholly be derived from their relation to his person, mediation, and grace: and, without faith in him and grace from him, all knowledge, ordinances, or external obedience, constitute only a "form of godliness." In both respects he is, as it were, the soul which animates the body, and gives activity, energy, and value to every part of it. This union with Christ is effected by the indwelling of his "Holy Spirit:" and where this divine Agent, 'proceeding from the Father and the Son,' and One with the Father and the Son, inhabits the heart, "there is liberty." He gives freedom from sin and Satan, from condemnation and slavish principles, from the love of the world and the fear of men: he renders the will free from the bondage of corrupt passions; he enables the believer to find liberty in willing obedience, and in spiritually worshipping God. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Notes, Ps. 51: 12,13. Rom. 8:1,2,14—17. 2 Tim. 1:6—8.) And he gives him confidence and boldness in his conduct among men, without regarding their censures and frowns, or courting their friendship or applause; from conscious integrity and satisfaction of the Lord's acceptance. (Note, 1 John 5:4,5.) Thus all Christians, in proportion to their degree of faith and grace, being made alive to God, free from the slavery of sin, and enlightened by the Spirit of the Lord, "behold with open face, as in a mirror," by faith exercised on divine revelation, "the glory of God" in the Person and work of his Son. And this "glory" beaming upon their souls with transforming efficacy; (as opaque objects reflect the rays of the son, and so become in a measure luminous;) they are gradually changed into his image of righteousness, purity, truth, and love: growing more and more like their beloved Saviour, in judgment, disposition, affections, and conduct, from one degree of this glorious holiness to another; even as by the work "of the Spirit of the Lord;" or "the Lord the Spirit," by which he new-creates the soul; and according to the measure in which he discovers the glory of God in Christ, and enables a man to behold it with open face and fixed admiration: till at length the work will be perfected, when the view of faith, as in a mirror, shall be changed for immediate and perfect vision. (Marg. Ref. u—z. Notes, 4:5,6. 1 John 3:1—3.) Some expositors explain the "open," or unveiled "face," to mean the face of Christ; rendering the words, "We all, in an unveiled face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, &c." The glory of God in the face of Christ is certainly the object contemplated. The veil on the face of Moses implied, that this glory was but obscurely shown by his ministration: but the veil, by the "ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit," is removed; so that the glory of God in the face of Christ is unveiled; and all they, from whose hearts the veil of prejudice, pride, unbelief, and worldly lusts, is taken away, see it clearly and distinctly. If the "unveiled face" be understood of the beholders, this latter "veil" is meant; and the contrast is between them and the unbelieving Jews: but if it be understood of Christ, then the contrast is between the obscure ministration of Moses, and the clear and full ministration of the apostles. As believers they beheld this glory: and through their doctrine, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, all Christians did and still do behold it.—The holiness of God, as comprising all his moral perfections, is his "glory," and the renewal of our souls, from those sinful propensities which are our shame, to increasing degrees of conformity to the divine holiness is transformation "from glory to glory," till perfected in heaven.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Even the appearance of self-condemnation is painful to the humble and spiritual Christian: whereas the proud and selfish court applause, and are highly gratified with it.—The conversion of sinners, and their subsequent holy lives, are the minister's best "letter of recommendation;" and if these effects be evident and abundant, he will generally want no other testimonial among real Christians. For his usefulness is manifestly declared, and fully understood, to be the attestation of Christ himself to his ministry; which attestation is written, by the Spirit of the living God, upon the hearts of his people, and made legible in their lives and actions.—They who profess and are zealous for the holy truths of the gospel should remember, that their tempers and conduct are supposed to exhibit the tendency and effect of that doctrine and ministry, which they approve and attend upon. Yet, alas! the prominent appearance of much religious profession is self-confidence, boasting, loquacity, censoriousness, a disputatious temper, bitterness, and clamour; with little strictness in the general conduct! "The epistle," thus exhibited to be "read and known of all men," often shows under what sort of a ministry it was formed; though it leaves the reader in great doubt, whether Christ had any part in it, or whether an enemy alone was concerned. (Notes, Matt, 13:24—30,36—43.) But many, who attend on the most faithful and practical preachers, exhibit such an epistle (so to speak,) to the perusal of the church and of the world, as has evident marks of spuriousness: while numbers charge all the blame on the doctrine and ministry, which are thus disgraced. But when professed Christians act consistently, obeying the commands and copying the example of their Lord, they honour and recommend the gospel and the preachers of it; and are instrumental in bringing others also to attend on the truth without prejudice. (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18. 1 Pet. 2:12. 3:1—4,13—16.)—Success in this blessed work should inspire our minds with confidence in God: yet we ought always humbly to recollect and acknowledge, that "we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves;" that our whole dependence must be on the Lord, both for endowments and success; and that the whole glory belongs to him alone.—It is a very great honour to be made "able ministers of the New Testament." We should not indeed suppose ourselves to be such, in that pre-eminent sense which the apostle meant: yet, by imbibing his principles, copying his example, and adhering to his doctrine, we may hope that the Lord will, in an inferior degree, qualify us for the same honourable service.—Even the New Testament will be "a killing letter," if exhibited as a mere system and form, without a dependence on the Spirit of God, to give it a quickening energy: yet it is by the blessed doctrine of God our Saviour alone, that the Spirit is given to sinful man: so that where this "light of life," does not shine, men remain dead in sin, and destitute of all that is 'good before God.'

V. 7—18. The holy law of God, though excellent and glorious in itself, can only be "the ministration of death" and "condemnation" to fallen man: but justifying righteousness and sanctifying grace come from Jesus Christ alone, and by the ministry of the gospel. This gracious revelation so far "exceeds in glory" the holy law itself; that it even seems to eclipse it, as the noon-day sun does the glimmering stars: so far do the clear light and glory of the gospel exceed those of all preceding dispensations. May Christians then learn to

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle declares his unwearied zeal and conscious integrity, in preaching the gospel, 1, 2. "The god of this world blinds the minds" of unbelievers, against the light of the divine glory of Christ; which God imparts by shining into the hearts of his people, 3—6. The weakness and sufferings of the apostle redound to the praise of the power of God, 7—12. He states the supports, motives, and prospects of glory, by which he and his helpers were induced to persevere without fainting, 13—18.

THEREFORE, [a]seeing we have this ministry, [b]as we have received mercy, [c]we faint not;

2 But have [d]renounced the hidden things of [e]dishonesty, [e]not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but [f]by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

3 But if [g]our gospel be hid, [h]it is hid to them that are lost:

4 In whom [i]the god of this world hath [k]blinded the minds of them which believe not, [l]lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is [m]the Image of God, should [n]shine unto them.

value the faithful ministry of the gospel, and encourage their preachers "to use great plainness of speech," suited to the doctrine with which they are entrusted! and may all preachers study and endeavour after this great plainness and boldness of speech, in all their ministrations; before the rich and powerful, as well as among their poorer brethren! May we read the Scriptures with continual prayer, to have the "veil removed from our hearts," that we may discover and "steadfastly behold" the Lord Jesus, as "the End of the law for righteousness to every believer;" that so we may profit even by those things which are now "abolished!" May we pray also in behalf of them, whose minds are still blinded by pride prejudice, and unbelief; especially for the poor Jews, who are preserved a living demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures, though themselves utterly unacquainted with their spiritual import! May they speedily be turned to the Lord, and "the veil be taken from their hearts!" and while we pray for a blessing on the designs lately formed for attempting their conversion, let us also aid them in every way, to the utmost of our power.—May we always remember, that the Lord Jesus is the Life and Soul, as it were, of the Scriptures and of all true religion: that, being One with him, by faith and his in-dwelling Spirit, we enjoy true liberty in the service of God; and that "beholding with open face, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, we are changed into his image, from glory to glory, as by the Lord the Spirit!" This transformation of the soul, into conformity to Christ, is the proper evidence and test of spiritual illumination; and without a measure of it, all supposed discoveries and revelations are mere delusion and enthusiasm. May then all, who are called ministers, have the eyes of their understanding enlightened, to behold in this manner the glorious Object of our faith, hope, love, and imitation; and point him out to others, with the same efficacy on their souls also: that so the triune JEHOVAH, Father, Son, and Spirit, may be glorified in all and by all, now and for evermore!

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The apostle, having had such a glorious and excellent ministry entrusted to him, as had been described; and being sensible of the abundant mercy which had been shown to him, in his extraordinary conversion and reconciliation unto God, and his call to the apostleship; did not faint, because of the dangers, difficulties, and sufferings, which he had to encounter: he neither disgracefully declined the service to which he was called; nor fainting sunk under it. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 2:14—17. 3:12—16. 1 Tim. 1:12—16.) But he and his fellow-labourers renounced with abhorrence all those artful contrivances, by which the priests of the idolaters, or the scribes and priests of the Jews, or corrupt teachers of Christianity, imposed on their followers; served their own dishonourable and dishonest purposes, or concealed their secret crimes. The true servants of Christ did not thus exercise their ministry; with "craftiness" or duplicity, professing one thing and aiming at another; and covering avarice and ambition, or sensual indulgence, under high pretensions to zeal and sanctity. Nor did they deceitfully model their doctrine, to suit the prejudices and inclinations of men, for their own selfish ends; by keeping back profitable truths, or making such additions and alterations, as might render their preaching less offensive; or by using ambiguous and obscure language, that their meaning might not be clearly apprehended. (Notes, Acts 20:18—27.) On the contrary, they endeavoured to set "the truth," as "the counsel of God," before their hearers, in the most manifest, convincing, and affecting light; that so, their doctrine, ministry, and conduct might be "commended to every man's conscience," even if his heart rose up against it: that every one might perceive the truth and importance of their message; and be sensible that both his interest and duty required him to attend to it: and this they did, as "in the sight of God," the ever present Witness and Judge of the "thoughts and intents of their hearts." (Marg. Ref. d—f.)—'What reason can be assigned why they, who ... preached the gospel plainly, should write the same things to the same persons obscurely? .. (Eph. 3:4. Phil. 3:1. 1 Pet. 1:13,14. 3:1,2.)—"Whatsoever things were written of old time, were written for our learning:" (Rom. 15:4.) and surely they who wrote afterwards by the same Spirit, wrote for the same end, that they to whom they wrote might "be wise to that which is good." (Rom. 16:19.)—And if they wrote for our learning and instruction, to be sure they wrote plainly and clearly as to them; since otherwise they wrote not so, as to instruct and teach, but rather to confound the reader. Seeing therefore the great end of writing the Scripture was to instruct the world, in the will and mind of God, and the great things of the Christian faith;—their writings are an effectual means to obtain it; which yet they cannot be, unless they are plain and clear, as to the great things of religion.' Whithy. This was written against the papists, who discourage the reading of the Scriptures, because they are obscure, lest the common people should learn heresy from them; and on the same ground they rest the claims of the church to infallibility, and the authority of their traditions. But the reasoning is equally conclusive against all those nominal protestants, who suppose that great learning and skill are needful to understand the Scriptures, especially the apostolical epistles; otherwise conclusions may be drawn from them, which they think heretical; and this is a consideration which is become of very great importance, in the strange and anti-christian controversy of late excited even among protestant ministers and rulers of the church, about the propriety of circulating the Holy Scriptures alone among mankind in general!

V. 3, 4. If then after all, the gospel, which the apostle preached so plainly, were "hidden," or "covered with a veil," as the Mosaic law had been; if its truth, nature, and glory were concealed from any who heard it; those persons were evidently as yet in a lost estate, and in the most imminent danger of final perdition; and the veil must be upon their hearts, through the prevalence of pride, prejudice, and ungodly lusts. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 3:12—16.) For Satan, "the god of this world," whom all unconverted men worship and serve in one way or other, prevailed to blind the understandings of numbers who heard the gospel, and disbelieved it through love of sin and pride of heart: that so the "illumination of the gospel of the glory of Christ," (Marg. Ref. k, l.) even the light which exhibits so clearly the glory of Christ, as "the Image of God," representing and displaying all divine perfections harmoniously exercised in the person, character, and salvation of Emmanuel, "might not shine unto them," or within them. (Note, Ps. 119:130.)—Immense multitudes of Satan's subjects are kept from hearing the gospel: others hear, and for a time are blinded by the temper to oppose or reject it: (Note, Matt. 13:19.) and his grand design is, at any rate, or by any means, to keep out this transforming light: yet many, who for a season were blinded, have been at length converted. But among the number of unbelievers the enemy is permitted, in awful judgment, to blind many to their perdition: and this was peculiarly to be expected by those, who closed their eyes to this light, when apostles were the preachers, and their doctrine was confirmed by evident and multiplied miracles. (Marg. Ref. l—n.)—'The fault is not in us, or in the obscurity of the gospel, but in their own blindness; for we hide nothing from them. Whithy.—It is astonishing that many of the ancient Christian writers understood the true God to be meant, by "the God of this world. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 4:8—11. John 12:27—33. 14:29—31. 16:8—11. Acts 26:16—18. Eph. 6:10—13. Col. 1:9—14. 1 John 5:19.) But it is not said on what account this singular title, "the God of this world," was given him. Is he not the God of all worlds, of all ages, of all dispensations? And is he not in a more special sense, the God of those who are "delivered from this present evil world?" (Gal. 1:4. Notes, John 15:17—21. 17:13—16.)—This shows also that the authority of the fathers, as expositors of Scripture, is not implicitly to be depended on: and that the concessions of the first reformers in this respect greatly embarrassed their cause, in arguing against the papists.—Blinded. (4) Notes, Ex. 4:21. 1 Kings 22:19—23. Is. 6:9,

V. 5, 6. The peculiarity of the apostle's ministry, and that of his faithful associates, was this: they "preached not themselves," they did not seek to exalt or enrich themselves; they did not aspire after authority, reputation, or any secular pre-eminence: and they preached "Christ Jesus" as their great Subject, in respect of his Person and salvation; and the great object of their preaching was to exalt and glorify him; they declared him to be "the Lord," the Lord of the church, and "the Lord of all;" and they called on men to accept of his salvation, submit to his authority, and become his obedient servants. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Note, Luke 2:8—14, v. 11.) But, as to "themselves," they were not only fellow-subjects of all Christians to their common Lord, but they were the willing servants of the church for Christ's sake: they judged themselves to be bound by the strongest obligations, readily to labour, venture, suffer, and submit to the deepest debasement, in doing good to men; as far as the glory of Christ could be advanced by it, or his command required it. (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) This zeal to glorify their beloved Lord made them earnest to be understood in their preaching; which ought to have recommended them to all Christians, in proportion as it excited the enmity and opposition of Satan and his servants. They were induced and enabled to act in this manner, by what they had themselves experienced; for they too might have been given up to be "blinded by the god of this world," and Paul especially was for a time in an awful state of opposition to the light of the glorious gospel: but at length, "that GOD who," in the creation of the world, "commanded light to shine out of darkness," (Note, Gen. 1:3—5.) had of his sovereign mercy effected a similar change in their souls, where ignorance, error, sin, and misery had before prevailed. By his new-creating Spirit he had removed all obstacles, and caused the light of divine truth to "shine into their hearts;" having prepared the understanding to admit, and the heart to love, the doctrine of the gospel. Thus had he given them "the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of God," by faith receiving "the sure testimony of God," under the teaching of the Holy Spirit: they beheld his glory "in the face of Jesus Christ," in his person, miracles, character, righteousness, atonement, and mediation; which, being thus steadfastly beheld with open face, as in a mirror, transformed the soul into the glorious image of God exhibited in it. (Marg. Ref. r—u. Note, 3:17,18.)—The apostle seems especially to have adverted to his own extraordinary conversion: yet he evidently meant to include the change wrought in the minds and hearts of all other faithful ministers and true believers; which is similar in its nature and effects, and effected by the same divine power, though not attended by the same miraculous circumstances.—"The god of this world" blinds men's minds, lest the light of the gospel should make known to them "the glory of Christ;" but God enlightens the minds of his chosen people, that they may "behold that glory;" so that this seems the grand distinction between those whom Satan blinds, and those whom God the Spirit illuminates.—Face. (6) 'The apostle continually alludes to the face of Moses, which was not uncovered, (that the image of God might be clear,) but covered.' Beza. The face of Moses gave a feeble and transient reflection of the glory of God, which was covered with a veil: but the face of Christ the Image of God, displays it fully and permanently to those who are divinely illuminated. (Notes, 3:7—16.)—"The light of the gospel of the glory of Christ," (4) and "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God," (6) are spoken of as the same; for "Christ and the Father are One."

V. 7. (Notes, Eph. 3:8. Col. 2:1—4.) This treasure (even "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Christ," and that important ministry which related to it,) was, as it were deposited in "earthen vessels." (Marg Ref. g. Notes, Judg. 7:4—8,16—22.) Even the apostles and most eminent evangelists were sinners, by nature and practice; their bodies were frail and mortal, as those of other men; liable to the same infirmities, susceptible of pain and suffering, and easily worn down by fatigue and hardship, or pinched with hunger and cold; nor were their minds less susceptible of fear, sorrow, anxiety, and disquietude, than those of their brethren and neighbours. (Notes, Acts 14:1 —18, v. 15. Jam. 5:16—18.) They were also conscious of many defects and impediments; and destitute of those accomplishments which the world generally admires: they had no wealth or authority; they made no show of superior genius, learning, or eloquence; nor were they delivered from the effects of in-dwelling sin. So far, therefore, from being such illustrious persons as to attract general admiration, they were treated as "the filth of the world:" (Notes, 8—12. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.) and, while their infirmities often rendered them less acceptable even to the churches; their stripes and imprisonments increased the contempt with which the proud and self-wise beheld them. This was appointed by God for most important purposes. He could have commissioned angels to proclaim the glorious doctrine of the gospel: or he could have put "this treasure" into more splendid "vessels," by sending the most eminent and admired of the sons of men to instruct the nations: but it was his plan to make it undeniably manifest, that the superior energy of the gospel, and the wonderful effects produced by it, were wholly owing to the "excellency of his power," as working by that doctrine; and not at all to be ascribed to the superior endowments of the persons whom he employed. (Marg. Ref. z. Note, 1 Cor. 2:3—5.) For this end he chose mean brittle vessels, by which to convey this treasure to mankind; that his power might be glorified in their preservation, and in the blessed change wrought in multitudes of the human race by their ministry.

V. 8—12. It was very suitable to the apostle's design, of re-establishing himself in the affections of his brethren at Corinth, to remind them of his sufferings and his support in that ministry, from which they had received such unspeakable advantage. (Notes, 1:1—7. 6:3—10. 11:24—31. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.) He and other faithful ministers were "troubled on every side," in every place, from persons of every description, and with all kinds of afflictions: yet were they "not distressed," or straitened, as men who had no way of escape or relief. They were "perplexed" with difficulties, and doubted, as men without any counsellors, what course they should take, and how they should endure amidst such multiplied trials: yet they were not left to "despair" of help and comfort. They were "persecuted," wherever they went yet the Lord did not forsake them, or permit their enemies to prevail against them. They were even "cast down," in the conflict with temptation and persecution: yet they "were not destroyed;" but were enabled to rise up again and to renew the fight, without any material damage to themselves or the cause. (Marg. Ref. a—e. Note, Ps. 37:23,24.) Thus "they carried about with them" in their bodies "the dying of the Lord Jesus;" in those bruises, wounds, and stripes, which they received for his sake, and from such men as had crucified him: that so "the life of Jesus," as risen and glorified, might be evidently proved by the protection, deliverances, supports, and consolations afforded to them which enabled them to proceed with constancy and fortitude

:n their ministry, amidst complicated dangers and sufferings. (Marg. Ref. f. g. Note, 13:1—4.) For while some of their brethren had sealed their testimony with their blood, those "who lived" were continually "delivered unto death," in the persecutions which every where awaited them: that so the power of their ever-living Saviour might be manifested in still preserving their mortal flesh in life and fitness for service. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, 1 Cor. 15:31—34.) Indeed death was, as it were continually at work on the apostle and his helpers, by the hardships which they endured in conformity to the death of Christ: but life had been wrought in the souls of the Corinthians by means of their sufferings; as they were not only exempted from persecutions, but were made partakers of spiritual and eternal life by their ministry. And did it then become them, to augment the trials of their faithful pastors by neglect and disaffection?—'While you are called to live for his honour, we may be said to serve our Redeemer, by bearing for his sake repeated deaths.' Doddridge.

V. 13—18. The apostle and his fellow sufferers persevered in their ministry; because they were actuated by "the same spirit of faith," which the Psalmist had expressed; when, amidst imminent dangers and distressing difficulties, he had declared his confidence, that God, according to his promise, would deliver him out of them all. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Note, Ps. 116:10,11.) They believed most firmly the doctrines which they preached; and therefore nothing could induce them to conceal, retract, or corrupt them. In the daily expectation and anticipation of martyrdom, they were fully assured, that God would raise their mangled bodies from the grave, by the power of Jesus, even as he had raised him from the dead: (Note, 5:1—4.) and that he would thus "present them," with all those to whom their labours had been blessed, before his glorious throne, as the objects of his love, whom he at length had made perfect in glory and felicity. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27. Jude 22—25.) They also fully understood, that all their sufferings, as well as their ministerial endowments, were intended to subserve the Lord's purposes of love to their brethren; in order that the abundant mercy and grace vouchsafed to them might excite very large numbers to thank God for the benefit received by their means; and thus conduce also to the display of his glory. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Note, 1:8—11.) With these prospects and hopes they were preserved from "fainting," or declining the dangers and difficulties attending on their ministry. (Note, 1,2.) For, "though their outward man perished," their bodies were worn out by fatigue and sufferings, and their lives destroyed by repeated violences; yet their "inward man," or their souls as born of God, daily became stronger in faith, hope, love, and patience; and were renewed more and more into the holy image of God. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Note, Ps. 73:23—28.) They therefore considered their various trials to be "light affliction," which ought scarcely to be mentioned, being as nothing, when compared with the end they had in view: and the continuance of their sufferings, though for many years, was but for a moment when contrasted with eternity. (Note, Rom. 8:18—23.) Moreover they knew, by faith and experience, that these afflictions were working out for them an increase of future and eternal felicity: both as means, by which God made them "partakers of his holiness," and rendered them more capable of spiritual enjoyment; and as he would graciously and abundantly recompense those sufferings which they endured for his sake. (Marg. Ref. z—b. Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Heb. 12:9—11. Jam. 1:2—4. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) The words here used are far more emphatical, than any translation of them can well be made. There is a repetition of the word hyperbole; by which is generally meant a person's exceeding the limits of exact truth, in any animated description or narration: but in the subject on which the apostle spoke, the boldest figures of speech must come short of the mark. If a man proceeded from one apparent hyperbole to another, and accumulated the most energetic terms as much as possible, he could not fully express the superlative excellency of that glory, honour, and immortality, in which the believer's sufferings would assuredly terminate. Compared with it, all temporal afflictions were levity itself, "a momentary lightness of affliction;" and earthly prosperity mere vanity and emptiness. This glory was substantial, weighty, durable, exceeding description and imagination; and human language must labour in vain to convey any suitable ideas of it. It would even have been an insupportable ing as it is written, [m]I believed, and therefore have I spoken; [n]we also believe, and therefore speak;

"weight" to them, until their bodies and souls were prepared by Omnipotence to sustain it. It was "a weight of glory," a fulness of God; a measure of knowledge, holiness, dignity, and felicity, in his favour, and presence, and according to his glorious excellency and beauty; adequate to whatever they should be made capable of possessing and enjoying: and all this would be unchangeable and eternal.—In this prospect the apostle and his brethren disregarded visible and sensible objects; they did not aim at worldly honours and advantages; they looked not at them with estimation or desire, as the objects which they aimed to appropriate; but by faith they beheld, and in hope they sought, invisible glories as their great object: being assured, that all visible and sensible things, whether pleasant or painful, the good or the evil things of the world, were temporal, or temporary, and would speedily be terminated; whereas the unseen objects which faith realized, were eternal; whether the final happiness of believers, or the final misery of the wicked were considered; and this gave such an incomparable importance in their judgment to unseen things, that nothing else seemed worthy of their desires, or of their fears. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)—'What an influence St. Paul's Hebrew had upon his Greek is every where visible. Cabad in Hebrew signifies to be heavy, and to be glorious. ... St. Paul in the Greek joins them, and says, "weight of glory."' Locke.—That the writers of the New Testament frequently hebraize, so to speak, is manifest: but whether this might not in some cases be intentional, may be questioned. Even the copious Greek, as found in the most admired pagan writers, could not have expressed, in full energy, many of the apostle's exalted conceptions; without some of those sublime allusions and metaphors, which are found only in the Hebrew Scriptures, or in the New Testament exclusively.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. They are not proper persons for the sacred ministry of "the New Testament," who do not expect the salvation of their own souls from the free mercy of God through Jesus Christ. If we have thus "received mercy," or have a prevailing hope of it; we should not "faint" under any tribulations, while employed to recommend it to our fellow-sinners. Indeed divine grace will teach faithful ministers, "to renounce the hidden things of dishonesty, and shame;" they will not "walk in craftiness, nor handle the word of God deceitfully:" and if any, who are artfully imposing on men for their own credit or profit, suppose themselves partakers of the saving mercy of Christ, they are as much deceived by Satan, as others can be by them. For the consistent minister of the gospel avoids all duplicity, and all appearances of it; he neither pays court to any man's passions, nor connives at his vices: but endeavours in the most perspicuous and intelligible manner, to declare, and with convincing energy apply the truth, and thus "to commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God;" that even, if his heart fight against the truth, his conscience may take the part of the preacher against himself.—If the gospel, when thus preached, "be hidden" from the hearers; it is evident, that they are still in the way of destruction: and they have reason to dread the consequences of their obstinate unbelief; as it is among persons of this description especially, that Satan, the usurping "god of this world," is permitted to blind and harden numbers to their everlasting ruin. It is his great object to retain men in the dark; particularly to keep out of their minds, "the light of the gospel and the glory of Christ:" he therefore spares no pains to drive them to a distance from faithful preaching, or by various prejudices to set them against it; or by manifold corruptions to substitute an inefficacious or pernicious doctrine in the place of it. His grand opposition is always made to the personal and mediatorial glory of Christ: for he knows, that no other knowledge, or religious observances, will sanctify, or save those, on whom this divine "light doth not shine;" and that none can perish who are illuminated by it.—But, though many "are blinded," the minister must go on with his work: he must not preach himself, either as the subject or the object of his instructions; but he must "preach Christ Jesus the Lord;" dwelling on his love and salvation as his favourite theme, and seeking his glory as the great end of his labours and, instead of aspiring to pre-eminence and authority he should willingly be "the servant" of the disciples of Christ, nay, of all men, for his sake, and stoop to any thing which may promote their good. (Note, Gal. 5:13—15.) Indeed, this will be the disposition of all those, into whose hearts "God hath shined" by his new-creating Spirit, to "give them the light of his glory, in the face of Jesus Christ." In proportion to the degree of our spiritual illumination, we shall reflect the image of Christ, even as he is to us "the image of the invisible God;" and we shall learn lowliness, self-denial, and love from that admired pattern. But without this illumination, the soul remains a dark, confused, and deformed chaos, when genius and science have done their utmost: nor can that knowledge of God and of Christ, "which is eternal life," be obtained in any other way. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. John 17:1—3. 1 John 2:3—6. 2 John 7—11.)

The apostle declares, that the assured hope and earnest desire of being present with the Lord, when absent from the body, rendered him indifferent as to this life, 1—8: that he laboured to approve himself to Christ, in the prospect of a future judgment, 9, 10: "knowing the terror of the Lord," he conscientiously persuaded men, 11: that he said this, not as boasting, but to furnish the Corinthians with an answer to false pretenders, 12: that the love of Christ constrained him to live no longer to himself, but to Christ; and made him dead to all other regards, 13—15: that all who are in Christ are new creatures, 17: that God, in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, and reconciled him and other faithful preachers, and had committed to them the ministry of reconciliation," 18, 19: and that as ambassadors, they, in the stead of Christ, besought men to be reconciled to God, through his righteousness and atonement, 20, 21.

V. 7—12. The Lord puts the treasure of heavenly truth into mean earthen vessels. He often employs persons of infirm bodies, moderate abilities, or low rank in society, even such as worldly policy would reject and despise: for, whatever instrument be selected, he will make it appear, that the "excellency of the power," by which the gospel is made successful, is of "God, and not of men." (P. O. 1 Cor. 2:1—9.) He therefore uses various methods to convince his most useful servants of their own weakness and insufficiency; and sometimes he makes their infirmities visible to others, that they may not give them undue honour and respect. (Note, 12:7—10. P. O. 1—10.) These earthen pitchers are very brittle: but the rich treasure, which they contain, is often made peculiarly manifest when they are most exposed; and when they are broken to pieces, it is sometimes more abundantly communicated, than it was before. (P. O. Judg. 7:16—25.)—In one way or other, both Christians and ministers must be troubled; and sometimes it will be "on every side." Yet faith and grace will preserve them from deep distress. They may be "perplexed" by various difficulties and complicated discouragements: yet they will be preserved from utter "despair;" the Lord will not forsake them in their persecutions and temptations. Even when cast down by their enemies, they shall not be destroyed; for he will lift them up again, and enable them to renew the combat. But the troubles and sins of ungodly men, as well as their temporal prosperity, will terminate in everlasting darkness and despair. It is indeed a great honour, though painful to nature, "always to bear about with us the dying of the Lord Jesus," by suffering for his sake, and after his example, from the contempt and enmity of this evil world: and he will show his life and power, by supporting and comforting those who are thus tried and exposed in his cause. (Note, Matt. 5:10—12.) Indeed, if we by faith are interested in our dying Redeemer, and conformed to him in outward troubles, and the crucifixion of the flesh; we shall, in hope, comfort, holiness of life, and constancy in his service, abundantly manifest his power and truth, as risen and glorified: and, as far as we resemble him, we shall be willing and thankful for "death to work in us," that life may be given to others by our means; and that many may be induced to live to the glory of God, when our course is terminated, and our warfare accomplished.

V. 13—18. Nothing can be done in the spiritual warfare in which we are engaged, without the "same spirit of faith," which animated the ancient prophets, apostles, and martyrs of Jesus: we shall be timid, hesitating, and wavering in our testimony, unless we can firmly say, "I believed, and therefore have I spoken." But when we are fully assured of the truth, importance, and excellency of the gospel; nothing can durably prevail with us to retract, alter, or conceal the great doctrines, which we are called to preach or profess. Yet true religion does not require us to neglect our real interest. It assures us, that "he who raised up the Lord Jesus will also raise up" all his faithful followers, and present them before the assembled world, as those who have honoured him, and whom he will honour. Knowing, therefore, "that all things work together for good to those who love God;" giving diligence to obtain the assurance that we are of this number; and being animated by the hope, that our labours and trials will conduce to the benefit of our brethren, and to the glory of the Lord; we shall not faint in our work and warfare. Even when our bodies waste away by disease, wear out by labour, grow feeble through old age, or are about to perish by persecution and death; the soul may be renewed and grow more vigorous and holy "day by day," and more ripe for the enjoyment of heavenly felicity.—But if the apostle could call his heavy and long-continued trials, "light affliction, and but for a moment;" what must our trifling difficulties appear in the estimate of faith and grace? How shameful then is it, that we should complain or despond under them! What powerful supports and consolations must there be in the hope and earnest of heaven, beyond what we have hitherto experienced! May we then seek to have all our "light and momentary afflictions" sanctified to us, that, by promoting our humility, spirituality, and admiring love of God our Saviour, they may "work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory!" We know not indeed what we shall be; but the unutterable nature of the felicity, which we are encouraged to expect, should enhance our value for it. That must be little, which human language can express, or human imagination conceive; but the joys of heaven will be immense and everlasting. (Note, 1 John 3:1—3.) On the other hand, what must be the weight of that misery reserved for the wicked, concerning which the Scriptures use the most energetic language; when all the sufferings, which a man is here exposed to, are light and momentary, according to the judgment of the inspired writers! Let us then "look off from the things which are seen;" let us cease to seek for worldly advantages, or to fear present distresses; let us take warning "to flee from the wrath to come," and give diligence to ensure future felicity; for "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—4. The apostle, continuing the argument of the preceding chapter, stated that he, and other faithful ministers, steadfastly endured persecution, in the assurance of a far happier state, whenever they should be cut off by death. (Note, 4:13—18.) The body might be regarded as "an earthly house," in which the soul dwelt on earth, and which must soon "return to the dust whence it was taken:" yet it was "a tabernacle," the unsettled and precarious abode of a few days, rather than a stated residence. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 4:7. Gen. 2:7. 3:17—19. Job 4:17—19. 10:8—13. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) This "house" or "tabernacle," was about to be taken down, and the materials of it to be "dissolved:" but when that change should take place, the soul being removed from a mean mouldering tenement, which continually needed repairs, and was a constant source of trouble, sorrow, temptation, and sin; would immediately have "a building of God," a habitation far superior to all which ever were made with hands, a blessed mansion in the heavens, where God displays his glorious presence, and where light, purity, and felicity are found in full perfection: and this mansion would continue to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, John 14:2,3. Heb. 11:8—10,13—16.)—As the apostle spoke of what was to follow immediately upon the dissolution of the body by death, he must be supposed to mean the state of the immortal soul, before as well as after the resurrection; for the language is figurative, and must not be confined by too literal an interpretation.—In this prospect, he and his brethren "groaned, earnestly desiring" to be delivered from their present troubles, and to be clothed with that glory, felicity, and immortality, which might be considered as the garment, as well as the mansion, of the blessed inhabitants of heaven. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, Phil. 1:21—26.) This he seems to have longed for, and desired to possess, without passing through death, if it might have been so. He, however, knew that as they should be at length thus arrayed, they would not be "found naked" or destitute, when they left this world, and all its possessions and accommodations; nor would they experience trouble, want, shame, or be [h]clothed upon with our house which is from heaven:

3 If so be that [i]being clothed, we shall not be found naked.

4 For [k]we that are in this tabernacle [l]do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, [m]but clothed upon, [n]that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

5 Now he that hath [o]wrought us for the self-same thing is God, who also hath given unto us [p]the earnest of the Spirit.

6 Therefore [q]we are always confident, knowing that, [r]whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord:

7 (For [s]we walk by faith, not by sight:)

8 We are confident, I say, [t]and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be [u]present with the Lord. [Practical Observations.]

9 Wherefore [x]we [y]labour, that [z]whether present or absent, we may be [a]accepted of him.

10 For [b]we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may [c]receive the things done [d]in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore [e]the terror of the Lord, [f]we persuade men: [g]but we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

any inconvenience for evermore. (Marg. Ref. h, i.) This then must be a most desirable change: for while they were in the frail tabernacle of the body, they "groaned, being burdened" with manifold trials, temptations, and difficulties, from which they longed to be released. (Notes, Rom. 7:22—25. 8:18—23.) Not that they desired to be "unclothed," by putting off the body at death, merely in order to be rid of its incumbrance. The prospect of that dissolution was not in itself pleasing to them; but they would rather be "clothed upon," by being taken immediately to heaven, as Enoch and Elijah had been, "that mortality might" at once "be swallowed up," and lost in life and immortality: yet the prospect of the consequences of death, and the hope of a future resurrection, reconciled them even to the pangs of the separating stroke. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Gen. 5:21—24. P. O. 21—32. 2 Kings 2: 11,13. Is. 25:6—8. 1 Cor. 15:50—54.)—The passage, being expressed in metaphors unusually bold, is indeed rather difficult; yet the above seems the evident meaning of it. Nor does it appear, that the apostle intended to express any expectation that the day of judgment and the general resurrection were at hand: or to determine any thing concerning the manner, as to external circumstances, in which the soul subsists, either before or after that solemn season.—The word "naked," may allude to Adam and Eve, after they had eaten the forbidden fruit, and lost the robe of innocence: whereas believers, being "made the righteousness of God in Christ," will not be thus "found naked," in whatever manner they leave this world. V. 5—8. That change of judgment and affections, by which the apostle and his brethren had been "wrought," or fashioned, into a fitness for their perilous and suffering employments, and to a willingness to die for Christ's sake, in the assurance of going to enjoy felicity in his favour, was the work of God himself, and could have been effected by no other agent. (Marg. Ref. o, Notes, Rom. 9:22,23. Col. 1:9—14.)—This is an express testimony to the Deity of the Holy Spirit, by whom we are sanctified.—They had also received "the earnest of the Spirit," in his sacred joys and consolations; so that they could not possibly be deceived in this respect. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, 1:21,22.) They were therefore "always confident" of the divine favour, and courageous in their labours and efforts, though exposed to the daily peril of a violent death: as they well knew that, while they "sojourned" in the body, they must be excluded from the immediate presence of the Lord Jesus, as pilgrims in a distant land. For they then lived and laboured by faith in him, as invisibly present with them, and taking care of them; which afforded them support and encouragement suited to the present state: yet it differed very much indeed from that intuitive vision of his glory and felicity, in his immediate presence, which was the object of their hopes and desires. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, 1:23,24. 4:13—18. Rom. 8:24—27. Heb. 11:1,2,27. 12:2,3.) This "faith," however, inspired them with confidence and courage; as they were fully assured that, whenever their bodies should be worn out by labours, or endure martyrdom, their souls, being dislodged from that tenement, would immediately be admitted into the presence of their beloved Lord.—This is absolutely decisive, concerning the felicity to be enjoyed by the souls of believers when "absent from the body:" and it also shows that they will possess their happiness in the very place, where Jesus displays his glorious presence.—The words "at home" (6) seems not well chosen. This world is not the believer's home, but the place of sojourning and pilgrimage; and his body is the tabernacle in which he sojourns. 'Those that dwell in the body are at a distance from the Lord; and those who have travelled out of the body,... reside, or are present, with the Lord.' Campbell.

V. 9—12. In this hope, the apostle and his fellow-labourers were "ambitious." 'It is flat to translate it, "We labour."' Doddridge.—They were ambitious, not of the honours and applause of the world, but of acceptance with the Lord, in respect of their persons, ministerial labours, and general conduct; though they should be unacceptable to mankind, or even to their brethren: that so, they might be supported, by the comforts and consciousness of his approbation, during their sojourning in the body, while "absent from him;" and that, when they should quit the body, they might be welcomed by him as good and faithful servants, and be admitted to "the joy of their Lord." (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Matt. 25: 19—23. Acts 20:22,24.) For they were assured, that both they and their hearers, and every man without exception, of every age, and of all nations, "must" necessarily, whether they would or not, "appear," or be "made manifest," in the whole of their true characters, with all the secrets of their hearts and lives, before the solemn and decisive "tribunal" of Christ, the righteous, impartial, holy, heart-searching, omnipotent Judge; who now called on them to trust in him and obey him as a divine Saviour, but who would surely take vengeance on all, who rejected or abused his salvation. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. John 5:20—23, 28,29. Acts 17:30,31. Rom. 2:12—16. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Rev. 20:11—15.) At this solemn period, every individual will "receive" the appointed recompense of his deeds, according to the things done while he sojourned in the body, or done by the body, "whether they were good or evil;" without any respect of persons, or regard to profession, or other distinctions. So that the justified believer, who from love to Christ has done good, uprightly and faithfully, will receive an abundant and gracious recompense of his believing though imperfect services: all his sins, and the defects and defilements of his services, being washed away by the blood of Christ. But the profligate, the infidel, the Pharisee, the hypocrite, the apostate, with all kinds of impenitent transgressors, will be punished according to the number and aggravation of their crimes, as evil only, in the sight of God, had been done by them. "Knowing" therefore "the terror of the Lord," what terrible vengeance the Lord would then execute on the workers of iniquity, the apostle and his brethren used every kind of argument and persuasion, to induce men, of all nations and descriptions, to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to act consistently with the character of his disciples. In this their earnest endeavour, the motives and intentions of their hearts had already been manifested to God, and judged by him; and they were confident of his gracious approbation: and, whatever the prejudices and passions of some at Corinth might suggest, the apostle was confident, that in general they were convinced in their consciences, that he and his helpers acted with integrity, zeal, and faithful a half, that ye may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart.

[Practical Observations.]

13 For whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God; or whether we be sober, it is for your cause.

14 For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

16 Wherefore, henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

[Practical Observations.]

18 And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation;

fection to their souls. Not that they needed or intended again "to commend themselves" to favour, as if this appeal to God and their consciences, as well as some previous protestations, arose from selfish or vain glorious motives. (Note, 3:1—3.) But they thus suggested such things, as were proper to be opposed to the censures and suspicions of false teachers; and gave the people occasion to glory in the disinterested labours and patient sufferings of their faithful ministers. Thus they might answer the boastings of those ambitious men, who gloried in appearance, as if very zealous in the cause of Christ, and greatly attached to his disciples at Corinth; but who were not really what they professed to be, and whose hearts entirely dissented from the language of their mouths.

V. 13—15. The great earnestness of the apostle to rectify the disorders at Corinth, and to re-establish his authority among them; his lively affections, and his excessive unrecompensed labours amidst sufferings and dangers, gave his adversaries occasion to represent him as "beside himself," and transported by a vehement zeal beyond all the dictates of reason and sobriety. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, 11:1—6,16—20. 2 Kings 9:11. Jer. 29:24—32. Hos. 9:7,8. Mark 3:20, 21. John 10:19—21. Acts 26:24—29.) But, whatever in his conduct had given them this opinion of him, it was wholly owing to his zeal for the honour of God and the gospel, and to his earnest desire to approve himself faithful. (Note, 2 Sam. 6:21—23.) And when at other times he seemed to act with great moderation and candour, and to debate matters with much coolness and sobriety; it was wholly from a regard to their welfare, and a desire to recover them from dangerous errors, in order to which he employed every method which he could devise, without regarding their censures, or any personal consequences. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) For in this, as well as in other things, "the love of Christ constrained him" and other faithful ministers and real Christians. The love which Jesus had manifested towards sinners in the great work of redemption, and to believers in calling them to partake of this inestimable blessing, had excited in their hearts such reciprocal admiring love and adoring gratitude to him, as "constrained them" and carried them on with invincible energy in every service, by which they could glorify his name or promote his cause: nor could any fears, hopes, affections, or interests stop their progress, when actuated by this most powerful principle. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) This, however, was no irrational or enthusiastical impulse, but the result of sober deliberate judgment. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11, v. 9.) For in this matter, they judged decidedly, in their most cool and reflecting moments, that if Jesus died as an atoning Sacrifice for all, "then were all dead," as under condemnation, enslaved to sin, and utterly destitute of power to deliver themselves: otherwise he needed not to die for them, or in their stead. "And that he died" as a common sacrifice for the sins of all men, or men of every nation and description; that when, through the preaching of his gospel to sinners, any were quickened and pardoned, and so "passed from death to life," they should, from that memorable period, no longer live according to their own inclinations, or seek their own interest, reputation, indulgence, or advancement, as they had formerly done; but should devote themselves, their bodies and souls, with all their possessions and talents of every kind, to do the will of the Redeemer, to promote his glory, and to recommend his gospel; seeing he had died for them and risen again, that he might be their Lord and King. V. 16. The apostle and his fellow-labourers, therefore, being under such immense obligations, influenced by such strong motives, and encouraged by such animating hopes, and assurances of assistance, as had been stated; were powerfully impelled to disregard all contrary and interfering objects, that they might show their love to their most gracious Lord and Saviour. So that, these principles having been matured in them, they "knew no man after the flesh:" they had no respect to men's persons, because of nation, sect, rank, or personal attachment, when their obedience to Christ was concerned: they could not accommodate their doctrine or conduct to the humours of men, from any worldly principles, or because of outward connexions with them, or obligations to them. Nay, they did not now regard their external relation to Christ himself, as being of the same nation with him, or otherwise acquainted with him. Even such of the apostles and evangelists, as had personally known him, or been nearly related to him, did in this respect disregard that external tie; when it came in competition with their union with him as believers, and their obedience to him as his servants and ministers. They could not warp their doctrine, or deviate from their instructions, to please the Jews, or the nearest relatives of Christ; any more, than out of respect to their own friends, or to the philosophers, or the princes of the Gentiles. (*Marg. V. 17. The judgment, experience, and principles, which the apostle had stated, should not be regarded as peculiar to him or his friends, but as the standard of genuine Christianity: therefore, "if any man," whether Jew or Gentile, was "in Christ," as a justified believer, he was also "a new creature," or a new creation of God. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, Rom. 8:1,2. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Ps. 51:10. Gal. 6:15,16. Eph. 2:4—10.) By spiritual illumination, and its invariable effects, a new judgment had been produced, with new inclinations, new affections, and purposes; from which new words and actions must proceed. Thus, old desires, intentions, expectations, connexions, and satisfactions "passed away," and were superseded: for, "behold," by the marvellous operation of divine grace, "all things were become new!" (Notes, Rev. 21:1—8.) So that the Christian experienced new hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, desires and aversions; he learned to speak a new language, to choose new companions, to act from new motives, to aim at new objects, and to attend to new employments. Every thing was now cast into a new mould, received a new impression, and took a new direction, from the knowledge of God, from faith in Christ and love to him; from humiliation for sin, and hatred of it; and from the desire of holiness, and the hope of eternal life. "he had reconciled" the apostle and his brethren "to himself by Jesus Christ," the great Mediator. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Rom. 5:1,2,7—11. Eph. 2:11—18. Col. 1:18—23.) And, having pardoned their rebellions, subdued their enmity, and "shed abroad his love in their hearts," he had entrusted to them "the ministry of reconciliation;" that, from adoring love and gratitude to him, zeal for his glory, and benevolence to their fellow-sinners, they might spend their future lives in earnest and unwearied endeavours to bring their fellow-sinners, "the enemies of God," to partake of the same mercy, and to devote themselves in love to the service of their reconciled God. This ministry implied that "God was in Christ," "manifested in the flesh." (Marg. Ref. e, f.)—The fulness of the Deity dwelt in and was displayed by the human nature, through the incarnation of the eternal Word and Son of God, as One with the Father: that so, being one with man in human nature, he might "reconcile the world unto himself," by his atonement, mediation, and grace; and that sinners throughout the earth, of every nation and description, might thus be encouraged to hope in his mercy, and taught by his grace to love his holy perfections, law, worship, and service, to which their carnal minds had before been enmity. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 8:5—9.) When therefore sinners were brought to God, as "in Christ reconciling the world to himself," in humble faith; he no more "imputed their trespasses unto them," but blotted them out by a free forgiveness. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8.) This "word of reconciliation" he had committed to those, who once were enemies, but who had been reconciled. So that they were now commissioned, as "ambassadors for Christ," to go in his name, and by his authority, and declare these encouraging truths to sinners in every part of the world. And they were instructed, not only to command them to repent and believe the gospel, and to exhort, persuade, and encourage them to hope in the rich mercy of God through Jesus Christ; but also to declare, that "God did beseech men by them," as the ambassadors of Christ: and they, "in Christ's stead," most earnestly entreated men, not to reject such astonishing love; but to repent submit to God, accept his salvation, and be reconciled to him, as his worshippers, friends, and children. (Marg. Ref. i—n.) For it must be certain, that he was entirely willing to be thus reconciled to all, who accepted this invitation: seeing that "He," even God the Father, "had made Him," his incarnate Son, "who knew no sin," but was most perfectly holy and righteous, "to be Sin," or a Sin-offering, "for us," who deserved the utmost severity of his vengeance. So that this holy and divine Saviour, being perfectly willing to suffer as a sacrifice, was dealt with as if he had been altogether a sinner: that thus God's abhorrence of sin, and his determination to punish it being so wonderfully displayed, he might honourably pardon and justify every believer, as "become the righteousness of God in Christ:" dealing with him as if he had been perfectly righteous, or "righteousness" itself; yea, "the righteousness of God in Christ:" for a far nobler, and more excellent righteousness was thus made his, by the gift of God, for justification, than any mere creature could ever have performed. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, Is. 45:20—25. 53:4—12. Jer. 23:5,6. Dan. 9:24. Rom. 1:17. 3:21—26. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, v. 30. Gal. 3:6—14. Phil. 3:8—11.) This verse contains most conclusive arguments, in proof of the vicarious sufferings of Christ, as a satisfactory atonement to divine justice for our sins; of the imputation of his perfect righteousness to believers, as their title to eternal life; and of his real Deity, whose righteousness becomes theirs for justification by virtue of their union with him. Perhaps stronger language cannot be used, in declaring these doctrines, by those who most zealously contend for them.—The preposition here used, is translated "instead," in the preceding verse: "in Christ's stead," or instead of Christ. Thus he suffered instead of us. (1 Pet. 3:18. Gr.)—The apostle doubtless spoke primarily of himself, and his fellow-labourers, as "the ambassadors of Christ;" yet, as all faithful ministers are entrusted with the same message, by the same authority, so they too are ambassadors, or envoys and messengers for Christ, though to a smaller number of their fellow-sinners.—Some of the professed Christians at Corinth were supposed by Paul to be unconverted, and unreconciled to God; and he might have them in view, when he spake of God's beseeching sinners by his ministers. But he was evidently giving an account of his commission and general ministry, through the nations of the earth: wherever he came, he addressed sinners in this pathetic and earnest manner; and while "he prayed them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God," it was as if God himself had besought them to lay aside their enmity, and accept of his mercy.—The change of the language, "ambassadors for CHRIST," "GOD beseeches you; we pray you in CHRIST's stead, &c." shows how familiar it was to the apostle to consider his divine Lord and Master, as One with the Father, in Deity and authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It is most animating for us to "know," amidst our sufferings, temptations, conflicts, and perils of death, that whenever we die we shall enter into the heavens, and be admitted to an unspeakable felicity: and this evidently may be known with such certainty, as to produce habitual courage and confidence, even in the greatest dangers and most evident approaches of death, in its most formidable appearances: but our assurance or prevailing hope of this, must be proportioned to the evidence of our conversion.—It is not worth while to be solicitous about this clay-cottage, or tent, in which the soul is now incommodiously lodged, or rather imprisoned because of transgression. We should not then be troubled to feel it, as it were, shake, or to perceive the tokens of its approaching dissolution, We must not expect ease or satisfaction, in "this earthly house of our tabernacle;" but we should look forward in hopes of "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." While "we groan," earnestly desiring admission into this blessed mansion; let us seek to be more and more "clothed upon" with the robes of righteousness and salvation: thus we may be sure, that we shall not "be found naked," when dislodged from the body. If in the mean time we "groan, being burdened" with manifold tribulations and temptations; or if we feel a reluctance to be stripped by the cold rude hand of death, and would rather choose to pass to heaven some other way, "that mortality might be swallowed up of life;" it may encourage us to recollect that even apostles experienced the same troubles and conflicts, and knew something of the same reluctance. But if the desire of having done with sin and sorrow, and especially of beholding face to face our beloved Redeemer, has given us, in a measure a victory over our fears, and made us willing, even "to be absent from the body that we may be present with the Lord;" we should remember that it is God himself, who hath wrought our hearts into this spiritual and holy disposition; and that these desires and affections are indeed "the earnest of the Spirit," and first-fruits of our eternal happiness. This should excite us to an unremitted courage and confidence in our duty, whatever dangers may obstruct our course. While "absent from the Lord," we may by faith walk with him, and derive support and consolation from him; for thus we may "see him who is invisible," and realize those objects which are unseen: and whatever hastens our departure from the body, shortens also our passage to the presence of our Lord, where is fulness of joy for evermore.

V. 9—12. While others labour for worldly riches, or are ambitious of "the honour that cometh from man," let us aspire after the glory of being accepted by Christ, in all our services during life, and of being received into his joy when we leave the world. As "we must all appear" without disguise before his judgment-seat, let us beware of hypocrisy, and be impartial in judging ouselves: and especially let us carefully acquaint ourselves with him as our Saviour, who will shortly be manifested as our Judge; that by his grace we may henceforth do those good things, which he will recompense, as the fruits and evidences of faith and love, in that decisive day. At present we may "choose whom we will serve," and what we will do: but, as we must die, so we must stand in judgment; and no more choice will be left us than is left to the criminal, whether he will or will not be tried, condemned, or punished for his crimes. The expectation of this solemn time of righteous retribution should render all men earnest and diligent, in "working out their own salvation with fear and trembling;" lest any "should seem to come short of it:"

CHAPTER VI.

The apostle earnestly exhorts the Corinthians, not to receive the grace of God in vain, but to seek salvation without delay, 1, 2. He most pathetically shows, by what labours, sufferings and patient endurance he, and his brethren, sought to render their ministry approved, 3—10. He assures them, that he spake of this the more freely, out of the great love, which he bare to them, 11, 12; requiring the like affect on from them, 13. He warns them against intimate connexion with unbelievers, seeing Christians are the temples of the living God, 14—16; and encourages them, by the promises of being received as the children of God, to separate from sinners and from sin, 17, 18.

WE then as [a]workers together with him, [b]beseech you also that [c]ye receive not [d]the grace of God in vain.

but especially it should excite ministers to be unwearied and faithful in their work: and, knowing what a tremendous day it will be to all the workers of iniquity, they should be the more earnest and affectionate, in their persuasions and warnings to sinners, to seek salvation before it be too late. Happy are they who are warranted to appeal to God, in respect of their faithfulness and zeal in this good work; and even to the consciences of those who are offended with their plain-dealing. This may sometimes be necessary, though men may censure it as "self-commendation:" and it is often useful to suggest to the people such things, as are proper to be spoken, in defence of the truth and in behalf of faithful preachers; that they may know how to answer the cavils and boastings of "such, as glory in appearance," but are not hearty in the cause of God.

V. 13—17. If earnestness to prevent the delusion and destruction of our fellow-sinners, and in the great concerns of the eternal world, bring upon us the charge of being "beside ourselves;" we need only inquire, whether our conduct be warranted by the word of God, and spring from a regard to his authority and glory; and whether our most vehement affections and addresses, as well as our more cool and temperate reasonings, are really intended to promote the salvation of souls. If this be the case, we may venture to disregard the contumely: and we should pray for our revilers, that they may indeed "come to themselves," and be delivered from that insanity, under which all unbelievers are held.—If our "judgment" concerning our entirely lost estate as sinners and the love of Christ as dying for our salvation, coincides with that of the apostles; we shall feel, in proportion to our faith and hope, the "constraining" influence of his love, powerfully exciting us "to live to him, who died for us and rose again." But many show the worthlessness of their professed faith and love, by "living to themselves" and to the world: and, alas! the views of most of us are so obscure, our judgments so unconfirmed, and our love so feeble, that comparatively, we live but little to the glory of our gracious Lord. On this account we need to be deeply humbled; and to "pray without ceasing," that we may be enabled to live more zealously and diligently devoted to him.—All partialities, from external relations or connexions, patronage or obligations, hopes or fears, which tempt the minister to waver in his testimony, or the Christian in his obedience, are inconsistent with a proper regard to the Lord Jesus: and in this sense we should "henceforth know no man after the flesh," whatever claim he may seem to have to our special regard. (Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. Luke 14:25—27.) The justified believer is "a new creature" in a new world: his new relation to Christ, to the church, and to heavenly things; together with his new obligations, interests, pursuits, principles, and satisfactions, have superseded those, which formerly prevailed: yea, "old things have passed away; behold all things are become new." Even the same actions are now performed from new motives and in a new manner, from what they before were; his attention to relative and social duties, and his diligence in worldly business, spring from new purposes, and receive a new direction. Nay, when baffled by temptation, he falls into sin: his grief, his shame, his distress, and remorse, are altogether new, and such as before he never had experienced. His heart was then stone, now living flesh; and sensibilities wholly new arise from this important change. Those who know nothing of this new creation, and so cannot understand these things, are not in Christ whatever they may presume: and the more evidently it has been and is experienced, the more clearly is a man's justification proved.

V. 18—21. Every good gift comes from God, and to him the whole glory belongs. Even they who are "new creatures," yea the apostles and martyrs, and all who are at present perfect spirits before the throne, were once "enemies to God by wicked works." This enmity to God began wholly on man's part; but the reconciliation was entirely devised, revealed, and effected by his offended Sovereign. In the person of Emmanuel, in his mediation and atonement, who "was made sin for us though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," the foundation of this blessed reconciliation was laid; for "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself." (Note, John 15:12—16.)—When the kings of the earth appoint ambassadors, they generally send them to those, who are of their own rank in society; nor would they deign to send a solemn embassy to their own rebellious subjects, when vanquished, disarmed, and condemned. But "the King of kings and Lord of lords," appoints ambassadors from himself to us poor apostate worms, and helpless perishing sinners!—Earthly princes select persons of dignity and eminence, to represent their persons and act by their authority, on these important occasions; but the Lord of glory deputes pardoned rebels, and reconciled enemies, to go to their former associates in rebellion, on this embassy of peace! (Note, Is. 55:8,9.) The gracious proposals which they are instructed to make, and the encouraging terms which they are commanded to use, are equally expressive of condescension, compassion, and good will to men: for the Lord himself, who might justly, and could easily, destroy them for ever, is pleased to "beseech them to be reconciled to him!" This language of our God and Saviour, by his ministers, to his feeble but haughty enemies, must appear wonderful beyond conception to the holy inhabitants of heaven: yet the reception with which it often meets, and the contempt and disdain which it excites, must exceedingly increase their astonishment; and it will assuredly satisfy them, concerning the propriety and equity of punishing the irreconcilable haters of God, "with everlasting destruction from his presence." The "ambassadors for Christ," however, must adhere to their instructions, with whatever reception they may meet. They should "magnify their office," and endeavour to represent their Lord, by exhibiting his image in their own example, as well as "declaring his whole counsel." They must conform to the laws and customs of his kingdom, and not to those of this evil world; neither fearing the contempt or rage of men, while "in Christ's stead they pray them to be reconciled to God:" nor yet seeking to please men, or expecting any recompense, save from their gracious Lord. On the other hand, let all who hear the gospel remember that the faithful minister is the ambassador of Christ to them; sent to treat with them concerning "reconciliation to God:" and that his Lord will surely punish every insult and injury offered to him, as if done to himself in Person. The refusal of this proffered peace will leave men "the enemies of God" for ever; the removal of faithful ministers, from such as have slighted their message, is the recall of an ambassador of peace, and the forerunner of a declaration of war. Let sinners then hear the voice of God, "beseeching them to be reconciled to him:" let the trembling penitent rejoice in the assurance, that his application for "peace with God will not be rejected." Let professed Christians examine their supposed interest in Christ, the great Reconciler, by inquiring whether they are become the friends of God, his cause, and his people; let ministers not only "warn men by the terror of the Lord," but beseech them by his abundant mercies, to repent and turn unto him: and let believers consider, whether God can now withhold any good thing from them; or whether they can venture, lose, labour, or suffer too much for him who gave his beloved Son to be the Sacrifice for their sins, that they might be "made the righteousness of God in him." (Notes, 13—15. Rom. 5:7—10. 8:28—31.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. The apostle and other faithful ministers, as "fellow-labourers of God," (Note, 1 Cor. 3:4—9.) employed by him in reconciling the world unto himself, joined their earnest entreaties to the Corinthians also, as they had to others, that they would not "receive the grace of God in vain." The word rendered "grace," signifies any peculiar undeserved favour; and when it is used for the regenerating and sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, it implies that this is a special undeserved favour. The unspeakable love of God to sinners, in the redemption by his Son and in the appointment of "the ministry of reconciliation;" and the mercy shown to those whom he thus "besought to be reconciled to him;" would be altogether in vain, to all those who "neglected so great salvation." (Marg. Ref. a—d. Note, Heb. 2:1—4. v. 3.) The apostle feared, that this had hitherto been the case of some professed Christians at Corinth: and doubtless many such would at length read or hear his epistle whom therefore he most earnestly exhorted and entreated, not to render all the advantages set before them ineffectual to themselves, by persisting in unbelief; but that they would, without delay, while the word of God was faithfully preached to them, embrace the proposals of mercy and grace set before them. For as JEHOVAH had assured the Messiah, according to the revelation made by the prophet, that he had "heard him in an acceptable time, and succoured him in a day of salvation," with a special reference to his intercession for the Gentiles, after his exaltation to the mediatorial throne; (Note, Is. 49:7,8.) so the present season of abundant spiritual advantages might be considered by the Corinthians, as "an accepted time and a day of salvation" to all, who sought an interest in the blessings of the Redeemer's kingdom. But those who refused the embassy of peace or were satisfied with a formal assent, a dead and unholy faith, might expect to be speedily punished as the enemies of Christ. (*Marg. V. 3—10. The apostle and his fellow-labourers, while they thus zealously fulfilled their embassy of peace, behaved with the utmost circumspection, that they might "give no offence," or cause of stumbling, in any thing; lest their imprudence or misconduct should expose their ministry to censure or contempt, and thus render it ineffectual. They therefore studied and were enabled, in all things "to approve themselves" such persons, as the ministers of a holy God, in so gracious and sacred a service, ought to be. This they did, "by much patience," resignation, constancy, and persevering assiduity, notwithstanding their multiplied and heavy afflictions. They were not discouraged, or induced to repine or despond, by urgent necessities and perplexing difficulties, even without obtaining a subsistence: or by repeated scourgings and imprisonments, from both Jewish and heathen magistrates; or by the tumultuous and overwhelming assaults of enraged mobs. But they patiently continued their labours, often spending the night, as well as the day, in unremitted toil; and adding religious fastings to those which absolute want imposed on them. (Marg. Ref. f—s. Note, 11:24,27.) To this "patience" they were encouraged by the "pureness" of their motive; and they "approved themselves as the ministers of God," by the holiness, temperance, and purity of their whole conduct. (Notes, Phil. 4:8,9. 1 Thes. 2:9—12. Jam. 3:17, 18.) They also showed themselves competent to impart all kind of divine knowledge and instruction to the world: (Notes, Eph. 3:1—7.) they meekly endured all injuries and insults; not only without seeking revenge, but without remitting their endeavours of doing good to their enemies, and of showing kindness to all men. They abounded in the fruits of the Holy Spirit, and confirmed their doctrine by his miraculous powers; and they exercised those gifts, disinterestedly and without ostentation, from "unfeigned love" to Christ, and the souls of men. (Marg. Ref. t—z.) They were "approved as the ministers of God," by "the word of truth," which they every where preached without adulteration; and by that "power of God" which rendered it effectual to the conversion of sinners, as well as by the miracles which they wrought. (Note, 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) They were also defended on ever side by the compact armour of strict integrity, and a universal regard to the righteous commandments of God, from the purest evangelical principles. This fortified them against the assaults of carnal hope and fear, against the frowns and smiles of the world, and against every assault of the tempter. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 6:14—17. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) Thus they passed "through honour and dishonour, through evil report and good report," without being elated by the distinctions conferred on them, or depressed by the ignominy to which they were exposed. The calumnies raised concerning them, and the commendations which they received, were alike incapable of drawing them aside from their steady course. The world indeed treated them "as deceivers," who imposed cunningly devised fictions on the credulous: yet they were conscious of acting in all things as true and faithful men, and showed to mankind the true way of salvation. The noble and haughty of the world, either knew them not, or despised them as obscure persons unworthy of notice; but they were "well known" to multitudes, as the instruments of good to their souls. They seemed continually exposed to death, or even enduring its stroke; yet behold they still lived by the marvellous power of God. (Marg. Ref. e—l. Notes, 4:8—12. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.) They were chastened by him, as in a state of tuition, and he used the malice of their enemies as the rod of his salutary discipline: but they were "not killed." They had constant reasons to be "sorrowful," both on account of sins and sufferings, and of what they witnessed in the world and among their brethren; and were looked upon as most unhappy men; yet divine consolations rendered them habitually cheerful, and joyful in the Lord. Though poor and needy in this world, they were employed by God in "making many rich" unto eternal life; and while they had no estates or property on earth, they possessed all things, by their relation to Christ and their interest in the promises: so that the whole universe, if they had been the proprietors of it, could have afforded them nothing more, as conducive to their real good, than what they actually enjoyed or expected. (Marg. Ref. m—q. Note, 1 Cor. 3:18 —23.) Thus the whole of their temper and conduct, in the varied circumstances through which they passed, combined to show, that their doctrine had a blessed effect upon their own souls; and rendered them holy, beneficent, useful and happy men. The animation, sublimity, pathos, and energy of expression, in this beautiful passage, have been generally and justly admired; and it shows how full the apostle's heart was of holy affections; and how open and communicative in speaking on these interesting topics. 'This is certainly one of the sublimest passages that ever was written.' Doddridge.—Making many, &c. V. 11—13. The apostle, being conscious of integrity and fervent affection to the Corinthians, opened his mouth, in this unreserved and energetic declaration of his principles, feelings, and conduct; so that he was not careful about the construction, which some might put upon his words: for his "heart was enlarged" with an earnest desire of communicating good to them. If therefore they derived no further advantage from his ministry, it would be wholly owing to themselves. They were not "straitened in him;" for Christ had made him both able and willing to be useful to them: but they were "straitened in their own bowels" or hearts, through unkind suspicions, groundless prejudices, and disaffection. Now the whole which he desired, as "the recompense" of all his love to them, and his labours and sufferings for their good, (for he considered and spake to them as his beloved children,) was, that they would "be enlarged" after his example; and open their hearts in love, to receive the salutary counsels, cautions, and exhortations, which he gave them in the character of a tender and prudent father. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 12: 4,15 1 Cor. 4:14—17. Gal. 4:17—20. 1 Thes. 2:9—12.)

V. 14—18. The apostle especially entreated his beloved children, not to contract marriages, or form any intimate connexions, with unbelievers, to which carnal motives might induce them. (Marg. Ref. a.) For this would resemble that unequal yoking of different animals, which the law of Moses forbad; (Note, Lev. 19:19.) and would tend to make them uneasy to each other; and indeed produce many very bad effects. For, if believers connected themselves with unbelievers, their views, principles, pursuits, and satisfactions must be discordant. The believer would be retarded and interrupted in his religious exercises, or his various duties in the family, in the church, and to mankind, or drawn aside from them. And what cordial and comfortable intercourse could be maintained between the "righteousness" of the one, and the "unrighteousness" of the other party? What "fellowship" could there be, in the most important matters, between the children of the light and those of darkness? What agreement could be expected between the servant of Christ and one in whom Belial, or Satan, who had cast off the yoke of obedience to God, abode and wrought? And what part or share could a believer take in the unhallowed pursuits and pleasures of an unbeliever, who despised the blessed gospel of Christ? For "righteousness and unrighteousness," "light and darkness," "Christ and Belial" might as easily associate in cordiality, as the believer and the unbeliever: all intercourse between them must be attended with restraint, disguise, or ᵗjarring sentiments and discord. Persons so discordant from each other would live in different elements; they would draw different ways, and counteract each other's purposes: so that the unbeliever must be a trial, a snare, a clog, and a hinderance to the believer. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) In particular, what agreement could subsist between "the temple of God and idols?" Would Jehovah endure to have these hated rivals placed even in his own temple? Now Christians were "the temple of God," his special residence, consecrated by the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, 1 Cor. 3:16,17. 6:12—17. Eph. 2:19—22.) For thus he had promised of old to believing Israelites, and with a view to the days of Christ; that "he would dwell in them," or "take up his in-dwelling in them," "and walk in them," as a man in his habitation, and so "be their God." (Notes, Lev. 26:11,12. Jer. 32:39—41.)—Let the Corinthians, therefore, value this special relation to God; and, as far as their relative and social duties would permit, let them separate from their heathen neighbours, and be careful to touch no unclean thing, or ought that pertained to idolatry or iniquity. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, Ps. 1:1—3. 141:3,4. Prov. 9:1—6. 18:1,2. Is. 52:11,12.) Eating things offered to idols, or with idolaters in their festivals, seems to be specially intended. (Notes, 1 Cor. 8: 10:18—33.) In this case they might be assured, that the Lord would graciously accept of them, and "receive them" into his special favour: yea, that he would be in every respect "a Father to them;" and provide for them, and protect, comfort, enrich, and bless them, as "his sons and daughters," by regeneration and adoption. This "the Lord Almighty," the omnipotent Ruler of the universe, had repeatedly intimated by the ancient prophets; and he now declared it more explicitly by his apostles, even in respect of the Gentiles. And what could they desire more, to compensate for all losses, self-denial, privations, or sufferings, than this most intimate relation and union with the almighty God? (Marg. Ref. m—o.)—I will dwell, &c. (16) With some variation from the LXX, and also from the Hebrew; but it gives the general meaning. (Lev. 26:11 12.)—Come out, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. It is the peculiar honour of faithful ministers and zealous Christians, in their several ways, to concur most willingly in the great designs of their Lord; to labour in concert with him, and with each other; and to join their sincere entreaties with his condescending invitations, in beseeching sinners "not to receive the grace of God in vain:" but tempters, seducers, false teachers, persecutors, scoffers, and all who oppose or disgrace the cause of God, are fellow-workers of the devil. The gracious declaration of the gospel, and all the abundant provision, which is made in Christ Jesus for the salvation of sinners; the labours of the most affectionate pastors, yea, the invitations of God himself by them, are often rendered ineffectual to those who hear them, through negligence, contempt, enmity, pride, and love of sin; save as they occasion their deeper condemnation. (Notes, Luke 2:14—17. John 3:19—21.) To prevent this fatal consequence as far as we are able, we should warn, expostulate, persuade, entreat, and exhort men, by every means which we can devise, to attend to "this one thing needful." We should show them, that "now is the accepted time, and the day of salvation;" that the present day alone is theirs; the past is irrevocable: the future may find them in eternity; their reason may fail them, the gospel may be withdrawn, or God may determine to leave them to final obduracy. (Notes, Luke 13:22—30. 19:41—44. John 12:34—41. Heb. 3:7—13.)—Through the intercession of the divine Saviour, whom the Father hath "heard in the accepted time, and succoured in the day of salvation" by carrying him through his sufferings, and exalting him to his heavenly glory, we now enjoy a day of grace: let then all be careful to avail themselves of it, while the gospel is sounding in their ears, and perhaps the convincing Spirit is striving with their consciences.—It is peculiarly incumbent on all who preach this great salvation, to "give no offence in any thing," except by their faithfulness, "that the ministry be not blamed;" and "in all things to approve themselves, as the ministers of God," who are sent to show the descendants of fallen Adam, the way of eternal life. (Note, 1 Cor. 10:29—33.) Patience under afflictions; constancy in necessities and distresses; perseverance under persecutions; assiduity in labours, watchings and fastings; purity, knowledge, meekness, kindness, a spiritual mind, "unfeigned love;" sound doctrine, producing an evident change by the power of God, in men's characters; disinterested steady integrity, as "an armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left;" are proper attestations of "the ministers of God." Thus supported, they may pass "through honour and dishonour;" they may go on unmoved, amidst "evil report and good report:" conscious of truth and sincerity, they may disregard the accusation of being "deceivers;" known and approved by God and his people, they may be reconciled to obscurity or contempt in the world. Their dangers and deliverances, their chastenings and consolations, their outward sorrow and inward rejoicing, their poverty and usefulness in enriching others, their contentment with, yea sometimes almost without, food and raiment, and their participation of "the unsearchable riches of Christ," may be contrasted with each other; and the whole of their conduct, circumstances, and labours, will concur to recommend their doctrine to mankind. But alas! how very few of those, who wear the garb or bear the office of ministers, answer this description! How very many are the exact reverse of it! How often do even the preachers of the gospel give such offence, and cause such scandals, by their evident, allowed, and habitual misconduct: that "the ministry is blamed," and men are fatally prejudiced against the truth! And how common is it for us to be drawn into

CHAPTER VII.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after holiness, encouraged by the preceding promises, 1; and to receive him, who had done nothing to forfeit their esteem, but had great love for them and confidence in them, 2—4. He shows what comfort, under his troubles, Titus's good account of them gave him, 5—7; so that he does not repent of having grieved them by his former Epistle, considering the happy effects of their godly sorrow, 8—11. He wrote to approve his care of them as in the sight of God, 12; and he rejoices, especially, in the joy of Titus, and in his affection for them, as excited by their good conduct, which was answerable to the apostle's former boasting concerning them, 13—16.

HAVING [a]therefore these promises, dearly beloved, [b]let us cleanse ourselves from all [c]filthiness of the flesh and spirit, [d]perfecting holiness [e]in the fear of God.

2 [f]Receive us; [g]we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man.

3 I speak not this [h]to condemn you: [i]for I have said before, that [k]ye are in our hearts [l]to die and live with you.

4 Great is [m]my boldness of speech toward you, [n]great is my glorying of you: [o]I am filled with comfort, I am [s]exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

5 For, [p]when we were come into Macedonia, [q]our flesh had no rest, but we were [r]troubled on every side; [s]without were fightings, within were [t]fears.

those improprieties of conduct, which prevent the usefulness of our most earnest exhortations! We should therefore continually beseech the Lord, to erase every unfavourable impression, which any past misconduct may have made on men's minds; and to prepare us for serving him more unexceptionably for the future: that we may give up every worldly interest and indulgence, and be willing to labour and suffer in the cause of Christ. We should seek to be made "fruitful in good works:" to be endued with "pureness and knowledge;" to be strenghtened in the exercise of long-suffering and kindness; to be "armed with the whole armour of God;" to rejoice in the midst of tribulation; to be far more desirous of making others rich, than of avoiding poverty in our own circumstances; to leave our character and concerns in the Lord's hands; and to count ourselves "to possess all things," in his all-sufficient favour, and exceedingly great and precious promises. (Notes, Phil. 4:10—20. Heb. 13:5,6.)

V. 11—18. Evident uprightness and enlarged love give confidence, in addressing even those who have imbibed prejudices: "our mouths will be opened" in the cause of Christ, by the consciousness, that we seek the good of the people alone, and not our own emolument or reputation. We shall be far more grieved when they close their minds against our instructions, than when they refuse to communicate to our necessities: and the most desired "recompense," of "our labour of love," will be their readiness to receive the truth from our lips.—It will especially be near the heart of such pastors, to caution their "beloved children" in the gospel, not to be "unequally yoked with unbelievers." The fatal effects of neglecting the scriptural precept in this matter are most evident. They whose trial it is to be thus connected, without their wilful fault, may expect peculiar consolations under it: but when believers will thrust themselves into these disadvantageous circumstances, contrary to the express warnings of God's word, they may expect to feel great and often very durable additional distress. Indeed, all intimate connections with unbelievers should be avoided. There can be no profitable "communion" between contrary characters: the attempt of making a coalition between Christ and Belial is unnatural and abominable; the kingdoms of righteousness and unrighteousness, of light and darkness, must wage perpetual war with each other; (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) and we are most likely to do good to unbelievers, when we stand aloof from all other intercourse with them, besides that of duty and compassion. If we be Christians indeed, we are "the temples of the living God:" and "what have we then to do any more with idols?" Let us value our relation to him, and not profane it: let us admire his condescending promises, of "dwelling and walking in us" poor sinners, whom he hath reconciled to himself by Jesus Christ. Let us earnestly desire to have his temple made and kept pure, that we may have the comfort of his manifested presence. Let us beseech him to be our God and Portion, and to number us with his chosen people. "Let us come out from among" the workers of iniquity; and separate from all their vain and sinful pleasures and pursuits, and from all conformity to the corrupt customs and fashions of this evil world. (Notes, Rom. 12:1, 2.) Let us not touch any gain or indulgence that is spotted with sin. Let us remember that the world, though called Christian, still "lieth in wickedness," and is full of unclean things which we must abhor. Let us assure ourselves that the Lord will receive all those, who come in his appointed way, and at his call; and that he "will be a Father unto them," and take them for his children: and if it be so envied a privilege, to be the son or daughter of some earthly potentate; who can express the dignity and felicity of being "the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty!" (Note, 1 John 3:1—3.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1. This verse is evidently connected with the subject of the former chapter. (Note, 6:14—18.) The promises, which God has given in the gospel, should excite all those who hear them to aspire after holiness, and animate them in following after it. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Ez. 36:25—27. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) All sin is "filthiness" in the judgment of God, because contrary to his holy nature and law. Sensual lusts may be called "filthiness of the flesh;" while pride, envy, revenge, avarice, idolatry, and all ungodliness may be intended by the "filthiness of the spirit;" or the former may signify the outward expression of sin by the body in word or deed; the latter, its inward workings in the imagination and affections. It should, however, be noted, that the apostle speaks of "filthiness of the spirit;" whereas modern theologians often speak as if the body alone were the seat of pollution. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Rom. 8:5—9. Gal. 5:16—21.)—Aspiring after acceptance, adoption, and communion with God, and depending on his promises, Christians ought to cleanse themselves from all pollution: constantly watching against all evil thoughts, desires, words, and works; mortifying every corrupt propensity; renouncing every sinful interest or pleasure; seeking for an increase of spirituality in judgment and heart, and abounding in every good word and action. In this manner they ought to proceed in "perfecting holiness," and in seeking entire conformity to the holy image and law of God, from reverence to his authority, fear of his displeasure, and an habitual sense of his holy heart-searching presence. Thus they should persevere, in unremitted endeavours after perfect holiness, as long as they live; because their highest attainments leave them far short of sinless perfection. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Phil. 3:12—16.) In this the apostle joined himself: thus intimating, that he too needed more perfect cleansing from the filthiness of sin; and that he called on others to do nothing, but the same which he himself was continually endeavouring to accomplish.—Perfecting, &c.] 'Still making progress in holiness.' Whithy. If any were perfect, in the strict sense of the word, the exhortation would not suit them. It would not be properly addressed to a holy angel, or to "the spirits of just men made perfect."

V. 2—4. The apostle here returned to his more immediate purpose of re-establishing his authority among the Corinthians. (Note, 6:11—13.) He called on them, to "receive" him and his brethren as the ambassadors of Christ. There could be no reason for a contrary conduct: as they had "injured no man," in his person or connexions; "corrupted no man," in his principles or morals; and "defrauded no man" in regard to his property, or in any respect coveted ought belonging to them. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—He did not speak thus, as disposed to condemn them for bringing such charges against him; for he had so favourable an opinion of them in general, that they were most dear to his heart, as he had before intimated: (3:2.) and if other engagements would have permitted, he would willingly have spent and ended the remnant of his days among them. (Marg. Ref. h—l) Indeed he was so confident that they would submit to his apostolical authority, that he addressed them with great freedom and boldness, not fearing but they would take it in good part; and he even gloried among his friends concerning their conduct in the late transactions, yea, he was filled with such comfort on that account, as abundantly counterbalanced all his trials. V. 5—7. After the apostle had passed from Troas into Macedonia, (Note, 2:12,13.) he was so harrassed with persecution, that he "had no rest in his flesh," or in respect of his outward circumstances: and he was "troubled on every

6 Nevertheless God, [u]that comforteth those that are cast down, [x]comforted us by the coming of Titus;

7 And not by his coming only, [y]but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, [z]when he told us your [a]earnest desire, your [b]mourning, your [c]fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more. [Practical Observations.]

8 For [d]though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, [e]though I did repent: for I perceive that the same epistle made you sorry, though it were but for a season.

9 Now [f]I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry [g]after a godly manner, [g]that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

10 For godly sorrow worketh [h]repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but [i]the sorrow of the world worketh death.

11 For behold, this self-same thing, [k]that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what [l]carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what [m]clearing of yourselves, yea, what [n]indignation, yea, what [o]fear, yea, what [p]vehement desire, yea, what [q]zeal, yea, what [r]revenge! In all things ye have [s]approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, [t]I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but [u]that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

13 Therefore [x]we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, [y]because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

14 For [z]if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as [a]we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth:

15 And his [b]inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth [b]the obedience of you all, how [c]with fear and trembling ye received him.

16 I rejoice therefore [d]that I have confidence in you in all things.

side;" because the outward conflicts which he sustained with his enemies, concurred with much inward anxiety about the church at Corinth. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Notes, 4:8—12. 6:3—10. 11:28—31.) But that God, whose peculiar character, prerogative, and delight it is, "to comfort" such of his servants as are dejected and discouraged, and indeed all those who are humble and lowly in heart, was pleased "to comfort him" by the arrival of Titus from Corinth. His safety and company were sources of satisfaction to the apostle: but he was still more rejoiced at the comfort which he had received from the behaviour of the Corinthians, and while Titus described their earnest desire to remedy all the evils, which had gained admission among them; at their poignant sorrow for having dishonoured the gospel, and their fervent affection towards the apostle, and zeal for him. So that his present joy was rendered the more abundant, even by means of the sorrow which had preceded it. (Marg. Ref. u—b. Note, 9—11.)

V. 8. The inspiration of the Holy Spirit did not supersede the exercise of the understanding and faculties, in the sacred writers: and the apostle's excess of concern, about the consequences of his former epistle, seems to have rendered his mind greatly disquieted, as to some expressions in it, lest they should counteract his grand design. If indeed he actually "repented" of having written so sharply, as well as had felt an after carefulness about it, as the word implies; this must not be ascribed to the things written, as if they had not been divinely inspired; but to infirmity, as not being fully sanctified, or freed from a propensity to excess of anxiety and solicitude. A physician, in full confidence that the case requires it, may give a powerful remedy to a sick friend; and yet his anxiety, about the event, arising from concurring circumstances, may induce him sometimes to wish he had not given it. (Marg. Ref.)—Some however render the passage, perhaps more accurately. "Even if I had repented, I should not now repent." (Note, Rom. 9:1—3.)

I made . . . sorry.] Ελυπησα. 9,11. 2:4,5. 6:10. Matt. 26:37.—I do not repent.] Ου μεταμελομαι. See on Matt. 21:29.

V. 9—11. The apostle understood, that his epistle had made the Corinthians sorry, as he expected it would; but this lasted only for a short space: he therefore "rejoiced," not in their sorrow which he shared; but in their repentance which had been effected by it. For they had "been sorrowful according to God;" under the influence of his grace, with reference to his will and glory, and in dependence on his mercy: and this had been so ordered, that they might receive damage, from the apostle, in no respect, not even as the innocent occasion of it. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) For that "sorrow," which was the effect of divine grace, and the fear of God, was suited directly to work repentance in the heart, and to render it humble, contrite, submissive, afraid of punishment, dependent on mercy, disposed to renounce and mortify every sin, and to walk in newness of life. So that this was "repentance unto salvation:" as always connected with faith in Christ and an interest in his atonement; and no man would ever repent of thus sorrowing and repenting.—Some are of opinion that the word, rendered "not to be repented of," should be referred to "salvation," rather than to "repentance;" in the same sense as it is applied to "the gifts and calling of God," in the only place, where the same word occurs in the New Testament, signifying its unchangeableness; or denoting a salvation which will infinitely more than compensate all that may be endured in attaining it; and the construction, in the original, seems to favour this opinion. (Marg. Ref. h.)—This godly sorrow, however, was totally distinct from the sorrow of carnal men about worldly objects; which, being separated from the fear and love of God, and faith in his mercy, often drank up their spirits, broke their proud rebellious hearts, drove them to suicide, or prompted them to the most desperate wickedness; and so "worked death" temporal and eternal. "The sorrow of the world," is the certain way to desperation, unless 'God prevent it; as it appears from the horrid examples of Cain, Saul, Ahithophel, and Judas: but the written tears of David give the clearest example of the other kind of sorrow.' Beza.—(Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Gen. 4:13—15. 1 Sam. 28:20—25. 31:3—6. 2 Sam. 17:23. Ps. 32: 51: 126:5,6. Matt. 5:4. 27:3—5.)—It was evident that the sorrow of the Corinthians had been "after a godly sort," from their "carefulness" to rectify and amend what had been amiss and their ready obedience in censuring the criminal: from their "desire" to show that their connivance at the evils, which had taken place, was not the effect of corrupt principles, but of inattention; that by thus "clearing themselves," they might preserve the credit of the gospel; from their "indignation" at themselves, for having thus disgraced their profession; from their "fear" lest such evils should again occur; from their most "earnest desire" of further degrees of purity; from their "zeal" for the glory of God, and from their desire as it were, to revenge his cause on themselves, by submitting to any humiliations or corrections, which were requisite for the honour of the gospel: (Marg. Ref. k—q.) so that in every thing, they were now freed from further imputation in this transaction. Numbers of them thus showed that they had not been directly guilty, though they had inadvertently connived at the offenders; and of this connivance they had repented, and sought forgiveness. Others who had been more directly criminal, had likewise repented, and concurred in such measures, as implied a decided protest against the sins which had disgraced the cause of Christ, and those teachers who allowed of them; and thus the church, as a society, was cleared from the guilt and infamy, under which it lay; and the whole blame now rested with the individuals, who still persisted in impenitence. (Marg. Ref. l.)—As this verse relates to the conduct of a Christian society in particular circumstances, and probably some of the clauses to one part and some to another of this society; so the several particulars adduced can be applied, only by accommodation, to the repentance of an individual.

CHAPTER VIII.

The apostle sets before the church at Corinth the liberality of the poor Christians in Macedonia, 1—5; and excites them to imitate this liberality, toward the poor saints in Judea; that they might abound as much "in this grace," as in other things; and show the sincerity of their love, as animated by the self-abasing and self-denying love of Christ to them, 6—9. They had before shown a readiness to this contribution, which would be graciously accepted by the Lord, 10—15. He commends to them Titus, and two other brethren, whom he had engaged in this service; and who were on many accounts worthy of their peculiar regard, 16—24.

MOREOVER, brethren, [a]we do you to wit of [b]the grace of God bestowed on [c]the churches of Macedonia;

V. 12. The apostle further assured the Corinthians that he had not written, concerning the incestuous person, from a personal dislike to him, or merely on his account in any respect; nor from regard to his father, who had been so grossly wronged in this matter; (Note, 1 Cor. 5:1—5.) but in order to show to them, as in the sight of God, his diligent and vigilant attention to their spiritual interests.—The other offenders at Corinth might also be alluded to: but it is evident, that the principal criminal was more directly intended. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Cor. 6:1—8.)

V. 13—16. The apostle's endeavours had been made very successful, and had eventually terminated in the comfort of the Christians at Corinth: and he now shared their consolations, as he had before sympathized in their sorrows. It also increased his joy, to see how joyful their conduct had rendered the pious heart of his beloved Titus. If then he had before spoken so confidently of them, that it seemed to be "boasting," he was not ashamed of it: for as his doctrine, and his professed affection for them, had been approved to be faithful and "true;" so this his boasting of them to Titus had proved true also. (Marg. Ref. x—a. Note, 9:1—5.) The love of Titus also towards them was greatly increased, while he remembered the obedience, which in general all had shown to the authority of the apostle signified by him: and how they received him even with a trembling fear, lest they should grieve him, or impress his mind unfavourably towards them. So that the apostle could now rejoice in the "confidence, which he had in them in all things." (Marg. Ref. b—d.) There was great address in this part of the epistle; and his kind acceptance of what had been done, and the confidence which he expressed in the church, were in general well suited to excite them to a more entire reformation; to withstand the party formed against him; to deliver them from the fascinations of the false teachers; to re-establish the apostle's authority; and to prepare the way for his subsequent exhortations, warnings, expostulations, and direct accusations and denunciations of the principal offenders, and of all who continued impenitent. For they implied, that not the church as a society but merely a few corrupt intruders were the subjects of these severe addresses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The promises of God should excite and direct us in "following after holiness." His grace alone can efficaciously "purify" us: but it is our duty earnestly to use the means which he has appointed: and, depending on that grace, to search out and cleanse away all "filthiness of the flesh and spirit," as abhorred by God and all his people. Perfect holiness should be the object of our unremitting prayers and endeavours: we ought to follow after it, as in the presence of God, and influenced by the fear of him, when no eye but his can possibly witness our conduct; and our lamented imperfections should excite us the more diligently to "go on unto perfection."—If the ambassadors or messengers of Christ would be received in that character; they must be careful "to wrong no man, to corrupt no man, to defraud no man;" or in any way to manifest a propensity to covetousness: (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Jer. 6:13—15. 1 Tim. 3:3. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) and they who reject those ministers of Christ, whose conduct and doctrine are thus uncorrupt, will greatly offend him that sent them. Yet we should avoid all rigorous censures, and show cordial love to the people notwithstanding their faults: we should express as much confidence in them, and speak as favourably of them, as the case will admit: and when they show a readiness to amend what hath grieved us; we should deem this a comfort, sufficient to render us "exceedingly joyful in all our tribulation." But we ought not to expect much "rest to our flesh" in this evil world: and if inward "fears" concur with outward opposition, to distress us; we only taste that cup, of which far wiser and better men have drunk more abundantly.—We cannot sufficiently admire the compassion and condescension of our God, in revealing himself as "the Comforter of those that are cast down." In all our dejections and perplexities therefore let us rely on him, as our all-sufficient Helper. And seeing the time of our extreme distress is commonly that of his merciful and effectual interposition, we should endeavour to make it that of our most enlarged expectations. He, however, generally works by second causes and instruments: the converse of some pious friend, or a good account of those about whom we are anxious, or the affection of such as we feared were alienated, are often sources of relief and consolation, in which the kindness of the Lord should be acknowledged with much thankfulness.

V. 8—16. Through anxiety about the event of his labours, even the faithful minister may be tempted to repent of his best intended and most scriptural endeavours to do good. He may fear that he spake too decidedly, or sharply; and so gave needless offence, or excited undue sorrow: when he only performed the office of an affectionate reprover, under the influence of the Spirit of truth and love. Thus a man may be much disquieted for having done his duty, and afraid of doing it on another occasion: and this should be carefully watched against with humble persevering prayer. Indeed, we should be reluctant to cause sorrow; even as the skilful and tender surgeon is averse to give pain, though he finds it often necessary: but we should rejoice in bringing men to that "godly sorrow, which worketh repentance;" as their grief will be transient, and the benefit eternal.—The loss of an earthly friend, the displeasure of a powerful superior, or other secular misfortunes, excite men's sorrow, and they think they have cause to mourn: how then should they be grieved for having offended their Creator, dishonoured his name, incurred his frown, and deserved eternal misery! The objects of worldly sorrow are trivial; its exercise is commonly unavailing; and it tends to death in diverse and most awful ways: we should therefore be peculiarly careful not to indulge it. Unless sin be mourned over, as the cause of men's sufferings, and God be regarded, as the righteous and merciful Author of them; their sorrow under afflictions and calamities leads to increasing enmity, to distraction, despair, and blasphemy. (Notes, Rev. 16:8—11.) We should therefore endeavour to turn all our mourning into a religious channel, that we may "sorrow after a godly sort." But even sorrow about sin and our eternal concerns will be of no use to us, unless it "worketh repentance;" and even repentance itself may be counterfeited or spurious, and so not be "unto salvation." Of all deceptions this is most to be feared; as immense multitudes are quieted without true repentance, by a groundless notion that they have repented, or do repent. A partial and superficial repentance; an unbelieving and despairing repentance, like that of Judas; a pharisaical repentance, which is presented as an atonement for sin, and the rival of Christ's expiation; outward penances, mortifications, and observances, with an unhumbled and unrenewed heart; apparent contrition, without renouncing the favourite iniquity, or throwing back "the wages of unrighteousness:" these, and other kinds of repentance, are not "unto salvation," but must be repented of, either in this world or for ever in hell. But deep humiliation before God, hatred and dread of all sin, attended by faith in the righteousness, atonement, and intercession of Christ, a new heart and a new life, constitute "repentance unto salvation never to be repented of." May the Lord bestow it on every one of us!—"Sorrowing after this godly manner" will work great carefulness and watchfulness in us, to amend our lives and subdue every iniquity: we shall thus be led to earnest and persevering endeavours to clear up the reality of our repentance to our own consciences, and to all men; we shall feel "an indignation" at ourselves for past transgressions; a fear of relapsing into sin; a vehement desire of forgiveness and sanctifying grace; a zeal for the honour of God; and a revenge, as it were, against those lusts which have excited us to offend him. When the faithful minister of Christ, who has warned sinners of their guilt and danger, and reproved inconsistent professors of the gospel, ("that his care of them in the sight of God" might be evidenced,) witnesses such "fruits meet for repentance," he will be comforted, in helping the comfort of the mourning penitents; he will rejoice in the joy of other believers on their account; he will exult in realizing the favourable hopes which he had before entertained: he will encourage the abundant affection of others towards them, he will commend their prompt and circumspect obedience, and "rejoice to have confidence in them in all things."

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1—5. The mention which the apostle had made of his confidence in the Corinthians gave him an occasion of again introducing the subject of the collection, that he was making for the Christians in Judea, which takes up this and the following chapter. (Notes, Rom. 15:22—29. 1 Cor. 16:1,2.) With great delicacy and propriety, he brought this forward by "informing" them, as an article of interesting intelligence, concerning the admirable conduct of the churches at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, in Macedonia. In extolling the generosity of the Christians in these cities, he calls it "the grace of God bestowed upon" men; the cause being thus manifested by the effect. Though the Christians in these cities had been tried with grievous afflictions and persecutions, by which they had been greatly impoverished: yet "the abundance of their joy," in the Lord and his salvation, had so enlarged their hearts to love him, and his poor disciples whom they had not seen; that a large collection had been made among them, and "their deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality," and thus illustrated it. So that the apostle testified in their behalf, that they were willing of themselves, not only to do as much as was in their power, even more than could have been expected from them; but that their inclinations were larger than their ability, and they would gladly have done more if they had been able. 'I have performed all, even with an industry beyond my power.' Demosthenes. (Marg. Ref. c—k.) Nay, instead of needing to be solicited, they had entreated him to accept of their contributions, and to take a part in the charge of conveying them to Jerusalem, and applying them to the intended purposes. In all this, they had exceeded his most sanguine hopes concerning them: for they first devoted themselves to the Lord Jesus, as his redeemed and "peculiar people, zealous of good works;" and then "they gave their own selves to the" apostle, and his fellow-labourers, to be directed by them in doing the will of God, according to his appointment, and in improving their talents to his glory. (Marg. Ref. l—o.)—The word rendered grace, is no doubt sometimes translated gift; but to interpret "the grace of God towards the churches, &c." to signify the large subscription for the poor Christians in Judea, as some learned men do, is wholly unprecedented: and the obvious meaning, viz. that their bounty to their poor brethren, was the effect of the abundant grace of God conferred on them, agrees far better with the simple and reasonable language of Scripture on these subjects. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, 16—24. 1 Chr. 29:10—19. 1 Cor. 15:3—11, v. 10.)

V. 6—9. If the poor and persecuted Macedonians had exceeded expectation "in the riches of their liberality," the prosperous and affluent Christians at Corinth would doubtless fully answer the apostle's hopes of them. When Titus had before been there, he had begun this good work among them; and Paul had therefore desired him to go again and complete it.—By "the same grace also" most expositors understand the benefaction itself, and indeed the word may signify the free gift of man, as well as that of God: yet it seems more consonant to the apostle's language, to explain it of the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, than of the gift itself, or their act of grace towards their brethren. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. p. x. Notes, 1—5. 1 Cor. 15:3—11. Eph. 3:8.) As, however, the Corinthians abounded in all spiritual gifts, and in various Christian graces, they would doubtless "abound in this grace also;" and exceed other churches as much, in the largeness of their contributions, as they did in affluence, or in faith, knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts. (Marg. Ref. q—u. Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 4:8 12:4—11.) He did not speak this, as a "commandment" how much each person, or the whole company ought to give: but, from the forwardness of their poorer brethren, he took occasion to make trial of their sincerity, in the love which they professed to Christ and his people, and which would he trusted be satisfactorily demonstrated. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Rom. 12:9—13. Jam. 2:14—18. 1 John 3:18—24.) For they knew and believed, and, as he was persuaded, were experimentally acquainted with "the grace" and most free and unmerited love of Christ to sinners, "that, though he was rich" in all the glory, authority, sufficiency, and felicity of the Godhead; yet "for their sakes," who were in themselves poor, guilty, polluted, and perishing sinners, "he had become poor," by assuming human nature, being born of a poor virgin in a stable; living in poverty and affliction for many years on earth; and at length entirely impoverishing himself, as it were, to pay their debt, and ransom their souls by his sacrifice on the cross. All this he submitted to most freely, in unspeakable compassion and condescension, that "they by his poverty might be made rich," with all the blessings of salvation; the mighty debt of sin having been thus discharged, and the forfeited inheritance of eternal life redeemed, with all things pertaining to their everlasting glory and felicity: and surely they could want no other argument to prevail with them to part, largely and freely, with their temporal riches, for the relief and support of his poor brethren! (Marg. Ref. b—f. Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. Eph. 3:8,14—19.) In the judgment of the apostle, Jesus was rich before he was poor; and it was voluntarily and graciously that he became poor for our sakes, &c. But indeed as Man he was born and educated in poverty; he was poor all his life, and "had not where to lay his head," and only became rich after his death and resurrection; and therefore if he was no more than man, he certainly was poor before he was rich, not rich before he was poor.

V. 10—15. In respect of this service, to which the Corinthians would, as it was supposed, feel themselves "constrained by the love of Christ," the apostle only offered his advice: (Note, 5:13—15.) for it would be expedient for them or profitable to them, and consistent with their profession and character, evidently to copy that love by which they were saved: especially as they had begun a year before, not only to deposit money for this use; but to enter upon the service, with a willing, earnest, and fervent mind. It behooved them therefore to make no hesitation about performing it; that their actions might coincide with the promptitude of their former determinations. In doing this, let every one of them proportion his contribution to his circumstances, for a small sum would be equally acceptable from a poorer person, as a larger from his more wealthy brother. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, Mark 12:41—44. P. O. 35—44. Notes, Acts 11:27—30. 1 Cor. 16:1—4.) Indeed, in every case, where "a willing mind" to honour and obey Christ, from humble love to him, was the principle of a man's actions; his services would meet with a gracious acceptance: nor would more be expected from him than he was enabled to do. To express and evidence this ready mind, the proportion, before recommended, would be necessary: yet it would not be proper to urge any man to exceed what he was thus disposed to give; lest, by competition with his brethren, he should entrench upon other duties. Nor did the apostle mean to relieve the poor Christians in Judea, by burdening those at Corinth; or even to exact from them, and exempt other churches, so as to give rest to the one and affliction to the other. He only desired that some measure of "equality" might be preserved among brethren in Christ: and that, in order to this, the Corinthians should, on the present occasion communicate from their abundance, to relieve the necessities of their poor brethren in Judea: and then, if a reverse in circumstances should take place, through persecutions or calamities, either to individuals or the collective body; the abundance of the Jewish converts, or of other churches, might be a fund for the supply of their necessities. Thus one might help another after an equal manner; according as it was written concerning the Israelites, respecting the manna; which though collected in different quantities, being thus properly dispensed was all used without the redundance being wasted, or any of the congregation left destitute of a sufficient supply (Note, Ex. 16:16—20.)—'So far Christianity seems to require this equality, as that we should not suffer others to lack the necessaries of this present life, while we abound in them.' Whitby.—The Christians at Corinth had also been made partakers of the inestimable spiritual blessings of their Jewish brethren, and at their expense; and it was equal or equitable, that they should impart to them, in return of their carnal things. (Notes, Rom. 15:22—29. Gal. 6:6—10.) How urgently the apostle pleads in behalf of his poor brethren while he would receive nothing for himself! V. 16—24. The cordiality and diligence of Titus in his attention to the Corinthians, as well as his zeal for the good work in hand, were "put," or given "into his heart" by the Lord; whom the apostle heartily thanked for this interposition in his favour. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, Ezra 7:27, 28.) Indeed Titus not only complied with his exhortation to return to Corinth, from regard to his authority; but he was so prompt and willing for that service, as not to need solicitation.—The brother who was sent with him is generally supposed to have been Luke, "whose praise was in all the churches," on account of the gospel which he had written, and for many zealous services in the cause: yet whether this was intended by St. Paul, who would be clearly understood by the Corinthians, is on many accounts uncertain. The brother, however, had been chosen by the churches of Macedonia to travel with the apostle, as their messenger to Jerusalem, with the contributions raised by them; which they were to dispose of, (as the deacons did of the donations of their several churches,) "to the glory of Christ," the one Lord both of the Jewish and Gentile converts; as the honourable evidence of their ready mind to such good works; and so as to cultivate love with their Jewish brethren by reciprocal kindnesses. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r—v.) This, the apostle had proposed and accomplished, that he might avoid all censure, and suspicion of injustice or partiality, in the disposal of those large sums of money, which had been raised: and that he might, by a prudent foresight, take care that his whole conduct should appear honourable, consistent, and unexceptionable in the sight of men, as well as that it should really be so in the sight of God. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Note, Rom. 12:17—21, v. 17.)—With Titus and the brother before-mentioned, he had also sent another of his brethren whom he had frequently found diligent in other services; but he expected extraordinary diligence from him on this occasion, as he was animated by the confidence in them, which the apostle had expressed. Some think that Apollos is meant; but this is not probable, for he wanted no recommendations to the Christians at Corinth: indeed curiosity rather than edification, is concerned in determining these questions.—If, however, any of them inquired who Titus was, that he should take the lead in this business; as the apostle's adversaries would be likely to do; (Note, 12:16—21.) let them be answered, that he was "the partner" of the apostle, in the sacred ministry, who cordially united with him in all his designs, and who was particularly helpful to him in the affairs of Corinth. If the other brethren were inquired of; let it be said, that they were the chosen messengers of the Macedonian churches, whose characters, zeal, and conduct in that important service, made them an honour to the gospel, and greatly instrumental in manifesting the glory of Christ. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) It therefore was proper that the Corinthians should show, in their liberality on the present occasion, before these excellent persons, and the churches whom they represented, "the proof of their love" to Christ; and that they deserved those warm commendations, which the apostle had bestowed on them. (Note, 9:1—5.)—It may here again be observed, that there is not the least reason to doubt, but that the messengers, entrusted with the contributions of the Christians for their Jewish brethren, were chosen by the suffrage of the churches: how then is it, that so little satisfactory scriptural proof can be adduced, that the spiritual pastors were elected in the same manner? (Notes, Acts 6:2—6. 14:21—23. 1 Cor. 16:3,4.)—'It would have been a most ready calumny against Paul, to have said, that he greatly desired the care of these contributions, that he might sacrilegiously convert the consecrated money to his own use; had he not by every means guarded against it. But who, during these thousand years, and more, has followed this truly apostolical example?' Beza.—Of his own accord. (17) 'Here we see the sweet harmony there is betwixt the grace of God, and our persuasion and free will.—Titus was moved to this work, by St. Paul's exhortation, and was also "willing of his own accord," and yet "God," saith the apostle, "put this earnest care into his heart."' Whitby.—"It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do." Concerning free will in this sense, we have no controversy.—All men, however their wills are enslaved by their lusts, have free agency.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. By ascribing all "good works" to "the grace of God," we not only give the glory to him whose due it is; but we also show men where their strength lies, and enable humble believers to read the Lord's special love to them, in the fruits of their love to him and to his people. (Notes, Luke 7:44—50. 1 John 4:19.)—Abundant spiritual joy not only supports the soul under great trials of afflictions, but it enlarges the heart in "the work and labour of love:" so that "the depth of poverty" in joyful Christians renders more

CHAPTER IX.

The apostle assigns his reasons for sending the brethren beforehand, to make up the collections of the Corinthians, notwithstanding his confidence in them, 1—5. He encourages their cheerful liberality; under the figure of sowing seed, from which they might expect: from God a large increase, to enable them to sow still more abundantly to his glory, 6—11; for such services, not only supply the wants of the saints, but excite them to abundant thanksgivings to God, and fervent love to their benefactors, and prayers for them, 12—14. He concludes the subject by "thanking God for his unspeakable gift," 15.

FOR as [a]touching [b]the ministering to the saints, [c]it is superfluous for me to write to you:

2 For I know [d]the forwardness of your mind, for which [e]I boast of you to them of Macedonia, [f]that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath [g]provoked very many.

3 Yet [h]have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, [i]ye may be ready:

4 Lest haply, if [k]they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not ye,) should [l]be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, [m]and make up beforehand your [n]bounty, [o]whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

admirable "the riches of their liberality:" for they do more than could have been conceived in their power, and manifest a still more enlarged good will. How different is this from the conduct of those, who will not concur in any expensive good work, except their reluctance be overcome by an importunity, as uneasy to themselves as to those who solicit them! The happy frame of mind, before described, must spring from an unreserved surrender of ourselves to the Lord, that we may henceforth live to his glory, as well as partake of his salvation; and then, giving up ourselves to the counsels of his faithful ministers, as far as we are satisfied that they instruct us "by the will of God."—Remarkable examples of piety and charity, should be brought forward, in order to excite others to a holy emulation: especially when the inferiority in outward things, of those who exhibit them, renders it less likely that they should be noticed: and such instances will commonly be found very efficacious to this end, among those who are partakers of divine grace.—Those whom God has employed to begin, will commonly best carry on and finish his work of grace in his people.—Such persons as "abound in faith, knowledge, utterance, fervent affections," and attachment to pious ministers, should be exhorted to abound proportionably in liberality to their poor brethren: and occasion should be taken, from "the forwardness" of some, to excite others to show their love to be genuine; for nothing can evince this, except the fruits of love, in good works to Christians for the Lord's sake. (P. O. Matt. 25:31—40.) "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ" was not declared in kind words only; but "though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; that we through his poverty might be rich:" and they, who truly know and experience the happy effects of his grace, will show their love to him and his people, by good works, and not merely by a cheap profession. But alas! we may easily estimate the small degree, in which most of us "know the grace of Christ;" by considering how small a porportion of our superfluities we retrench, and how little we deny ourselves, submit willingly to privations, forego the prospect of wealth, endure inconveniences, and stoop to men of low estate, from love to his name. Doubtless, this is the proper standard of our spiritual knowledge of Christ. In proportion to our views of his glory, we shall bear his image: and if this change were more fully effected, we should embrace poverty, endure hardship, and even "lay down our lives" for the good of his people, when properly called to it; and at last, we should deem all this as nothing, when compared with our obligations to his infinite love.

V. 10—15. We may not positively enjoin the proportion, in which Christians should communicate to the relief of the necessitous: yet we may advise them concerning what is becoming, and consistent with their ability, profession, and hopeful beginnings; that their "readiness to will" may be manifested by the performance of it. But, while the wealthy must be charged "to be ready to communicate," (Note, 1 Tim. 6:17—19. P. O. 13—21.) the poorer should be encouraged to contribute their help also; yet without being urged to what may distress them: for "if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted." This is indeed an universal rule: the sinner's "ready mind," to repent, to believe in Christ, to love and obey him, and to do good to others for his sake, springs from divine grace: without this, all external services must be ostentatious and hypocritical: but where this is first produced, the defective attempts of the believer to glorify God will be accepted and graciously rewarded; though in strict justice, according to the perfect and holy law, they merit condemnation.—We should be careful to act impartially in promoting works of charity: one should not be burdened to ease another, but "equality" and reciprocal help should be aimed at. Even among the poor people, in any parish or congregation, the most distressed may be relieved by such as are less straitened, with what they can at present spare; and when they in their turn come to be straitened, their brethren may concur to help them. Thus mutual love will be cemented, and prayers and thanksgivings for each other will be multiplied: and though none will thus have any thing superfluous, yet absolute want may commonly be excluded. But upon a larger scale, and where more wealthy persons are concerned, greater effects may be produced; and the most prosperous may be exhorted to liberality, from the consideration of the vicissitude and uncertainty prevalent in human affairs: nor can riches be secured so effectually, for the benefit of the possessor or his family, as by thus "lending them to the Lord." (Notes, 9:6—11. Prov. 11:24,25. 19: 17.)

V. 16—24. We ought fervently to love those, who have an earnest care for the welfare of the church, and to be thankful to our benefactors: but the Lord who "put it into their hearts" should be first acknowledged and adored. It is becoming to show a readiness for difficult and laborious services, and even to render exhortations superfluous, by "a willing mind:" and it is proper to commend what is good in the most candid manner; for this is often the best method of exciting men to redoubled diligence. All our good works should be referred to the glory of the Lord, and be considered, as the evidences of our ready mind to his service.—Whatever disputes may have arisen about the appointment of rulers and officers in the church; it seems indisputable, that men should choose the persons, who are to manage their charitable contributions; though they may be counselled to select those, "whose praise is in all the churches."—When ministers are in any way entrusted with large sums of money; they should be peculiarly careful to avoid all occasion of suspicion, or "appearance of evil." (Note, and P. O. John 12:1—8.) It is indeed in the first place necessary to act uprightly in the sight of God; but "things honest in the sight of men" ought also to be circumspectly "provided for." The world is full of selfishness and enmity to true religion; and suspicions and slanders will be unavoidable, without great prudence as well as exact conscientiousness: whereas a clear character, as well as a pure conscience, is requisite to enlarged usefulness When approved, diligent, and faithful men are employed in services evidently conducive to the benefit of mankind, and the glory of God; they are not only honoured by their brethren, but their character, conduct, and usefulness is "the glory of Christ," and his gospel is recommended by them. It therefore behooves Christians among whom they labour to respect them, and "to show, before them and the churches" of Christ, "the proof of their love," and of the expectations which have been raised concerning them.

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1—5. Beza explains the "ministering to the saints," not of the money contributed, but of the office and duty of those persons, who were chosen to take charge of it, and the care of the church at Corinth in selecting them: the context however does not seem to favour this interpretation, at least as exclusive.—The whole transaction, from the first thought and proposal of thus relieving the poor Christians in Judea, to the completion of the design, in the distribution of the money among them, by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, may be included in this general term. (Notes, 12—15. 8:1—5.) The apostle, however, deemed it "superfluous," for him to write particularly, on the duty and benefits of ministering to the necessities of the saints: as he took it for granted, that the Corinthians were well instructed in this respect, and even "taught by God" himself thus to show love to their brethren. (Notes, 1 Thes. 4:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:22.) He also knew that they were "forward" to concur in the present good work: and accordingly he had spoken of them, with confidence, to the Macedonians; declaring that the Christians in Achaia, (of which Corinth was the capital city,) had been ready with their contributions a year before, and their zeal, in so good a cause, had quickened and excited many, who were before remiss. (Note, 8:10—15.) Yet he had sent Titus and the other brethren to complete the design, lest his boasting of their readiness should be "in vain in that behalf:" for though he did not doubt but they would contribute, yet he feared lest they should not have all things in readiness when he came. And in that case the Macedonians, who accompanied him, would witness this circumstance; which would put him to shame, for having boasted so confidently of them: not to say, that it would tend to their disgrace, for having disappointed the expectations, which had been formed respecting them. (Note, 7:13—16.) He had therefore judged it needful to desire the brethren to go before him to make up their contributions, of which mention had been made before, both to them and the Macedonians: that it might evidently appear to be "bounty," or benefactions willingly bestowed, and not money extorted from them by importunity.

6 But [a]this I say, [b]he which soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully.

7 Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; [p]not grudgingly, or of necessity: for [q]God loveth a cheerful giver.

[Practical Observations.]

8 And [r]God is able to make [s]all grace abound toward you; that, ye, [t]always having all sufficiency in all things, [u]may abound to every good work:

9 (As it is written, [x]He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: [y]his righteousness remaineth for ever.

10 Now [z]he that ministereth seed to the sower, both minister bread for your food, and [a]multiply your seed sown, [b]and increase the fruits of your righteousness;)

11 Being [c]enriched in every thing to all [d]bountifulness, [e]which causeth through us thanksgiving to God.

12 For [f]the administration of this service not [f]only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God;

13 While by the experiment of this ministration [g]they glorify God for your [h]professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, [i]and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men;

14 And [k]by their prayer for you, which [l]long after you, for [m]the exceeding grace of God in you.

15 [n]Thanks be unto God for [o]his unspeakable gift.

V. 6, 7. The apostle would not prescribe the proportion, which every one ought to give; nor would he write, as one who aimed to extort money from them: but "this he said," that God would measure to them, according to the measure which they should use towards their poor brethren. (Note, Luke 6:37,38.) The seed-corn may to an ignorant person seem to be thrown away; yet this alone yields an increase: the prudent husbandman will not therefore "sow sparingly," for he knows that, in that case, he must expect to "reap sparingly:" but, when the ground is well prepared, it may be expected, that if he "sow liberally" he will receive a proportionable increase. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, Gal. 6:6—10.) Thus, money spent in acts of piety and charity seems, to unbelief and selfishness, finally thrown away: but in fact, when given from proper principles, it is "seed sown," and the only part of a man's substance from which a valuable increase can be expected. God in his providence often frowns upon the undertakings of him who gives sparingly, and by concurring causes keeps him poor, the evidence of his conversion must thus be rendered proportionably dubious: if he be a real Christian, his consolations will be scanty, according to his penurious conduct towards his brethren; and his final recompense will be proportioned to the small measure of his present fruitfulness. But he who "sows bountifully," from gratitude to God and love to man, will in every sense reap a plentiful and bountiful increase. (Notes, 1—5,8—11. Prov. 11:18,24,25. Is. 58:5—12.)—Let then every one determine for himself, how much he would spare from other expenses, or deduct from his accumulating treasure, to sow in this fertile field, from which the word of God insured so large an increase: and let no man do it "grudgingly, or of necessity," merely to keep up his character, or through the importunity of ministers, or Christian brethren: for "God loveth the cheerful giver," and no other; as this is the effect and evidence of his grace, and therefore "well pleasing to him through Jesus Christ."—'Two things are excluded by the apostle, namely, grief and necessity,' (Gr.) 'when, for instance, any person gives indeed, but with a grudging and illiberal mind, or even unwillingly, because he would not be evil spoken of among others; else he would not give at all.' Beza.

V. 8—11. The Lord would without fail, in one way or other, make up to the givers what they cheerfully expended in the good work, of which the apostle was speaking: for he was "able to make all grace" or gift of unmerited favour "to abound to them;" that so, "having a sufficiency of all things' desirable for themselves and families, and being enlarged in faith and love, they might have both a willing mind and ability for every good work. (Marg. Ref. r—u. Note, 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) Thus the character and blessedness, mentioned by the Psalmist, would be verified in them: (Notes, Ps. 112:5—10.) and their acts of kindness to the poor, from love to Christ, would be accepted works of righteousness, of which the benefit would remain with them for ever.—The apostle therefore besought God, who, in his providence, both supplied the husbandman with seed, and mankind in general with food, from the increase of the field; (Note, Is. 55:10,11.) that he would provide for their wants, in proportion to their seed sown in acts of liberal love; "multiply" to them the ability of sowing more in the same manner; accompany it with a larger blessing to others; cause them to abound more and more in "the fruits of righteousness:" and give them an increase of comfort in their own souls. (Note, Phil. 4:14—20.) That so, "being enriched in every thing," they might be enabled "to all bountifulness," which would occasion numbers to thank God on their behalf; and the apostle would then rejoice [o]to be the instrument of such an honourable and beneficial work. (Marg Ref. z—d. Notes, Phil. 1:9—11. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet 4:8—11.)—The tenth verse may be thus literally translated. "May he who supplieth seed to the sower, and bread for food, supply and multiply your seed, and increase the productions of your righteousness." The sense is thus rendered more obvious, but it is not materially altered.—The word rendered "seed sown," more properly signifies "seed for sowing," that is, enabling those spoken of to sow plentifully for a future harvest, from the increase of that which they had sown before.—He hath dispersed, &c. V. 12—15. The proper administration of the service which was spoken of, by the liberal contribution of believers towards it, and the faithful and prudent application of the sums thus raised, would not only relieve the necessities of the poor saints in Judea, to whose comfort they ought gladly to communicate; but it would also abound "in many thanksgivings to God," both for the seasonable supply given them, and for his grace bestowed on the Gentile converts. Thus experiencing the comfort of their brotherly love, they would praise and glorify God for bringing them to act so consistently with their "professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ;" and for exciting them to so "liberal a distribution" to their brethren, there and elsewhere. (Marg. Ref. e—i.) At the same time, their brethren, thus seasonably relieved, would glorify God by their fervent prayers in their behalf: and they would very much long to be acquainted with them; because of their admiration of the "exceeding grace of God," by which so happy a change had been effected in their character and conduct. This last consideration caused the apostle to break out in thanks to God, for the unspeakable grace of the gospel, and the gift of his Son to be the Saviour of sinners; by whom idolatrous Gentiles had been thus brought to glorify him; a foundation had been laid for the

CHAPTER X.

The apostle entreats the Corinthians not to leave him any cause to exert his spiritual power, "and the weapons of his warfare," "which were mighty through God" for men's salvation, in rebuking those who despised his person and ministry, 1—6; assuring them, that when he came, he should be found as powerful in deeds, as he was in writing when absent, 7—11: and contrasting his own conduct, with the ostentatious boastings and ambitious intrusions of the false teachers, 12—18.

NOW [a]I Paul myself [b]beseech you, [c]by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in [†]presence am [d]base among you, but being absent [e]am bold toward you:

2 But I beseech you, [f]that I may not be bold when I am present with that confidence, wherewith I think to be bold against some, which [†]think of us as if [g]we walked according to the flesh.

3 For though [h]we walk in the flesh, [†]we do not war after the flesh:

4 (For [k]the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but [l]mighty [‡]through God [m]to the pulling down of strong holds;)

5 Casting [n]down [§]imaginations, [o]and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and [p]bringing into captivity [q]every thought to [r]the obedience of Christ;

6 And having [s]in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, [t]when your obedience is fulfilled.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The duty of "ministering to the saints" is so obvious, that it might be deemed superfluous to exhort Christians to it: yet they are so apt to forget their principles and obligations; and the remains of unbelief and carnal self-love war so powerfully against the "constraining love of Christ" in their hearts; that it is in general necessary "to stir up their minds by way of remembrance." This is often done most effectually, by expressing a favourable opinion of them, and high expectations from them; by commending the forwardness which they have shown on former occasions, and the happy effects of their zeal on the conduct of others: and when we have a prevailing confidence, that the persons addressed are real believers, this will consist with "godly sincerity," and may be considered as true wisdom. (Note, Heb. 6:9—12.)—It is very painful for ministers to be compelled to retract, or excuse, the commendations which their fervent love had bestowed on their people; and when other Christians witness in them a conduct inconsistent with such "confident boastings." Men should be very careful not to shame, or grieve in this manner their faithful pastors; for that will eventually tend to their own deeper disgrace.—Many an intended good work has been neglected, or rendered useless, by delay: it is therefore proper to exhort men to be prompt in doing what they have shown a willingness to engage in. (Notes, Prov. 3:27,28. Ec. 9:10.) Works of piety and charity should flow, spontaneously, as water out of a fountain, from the gratitude and benevolence of a believing heart; and not require extorting by importunity. This savours of "coveteousness;" and it even puts those who labour in useful designs, to the painful necessity of endeavouring to draw money from such as ought to give, but are reluctant to part with it. Yet the main benefit of every act of charity, for the Lord's sake, will redound to the giver. (Note, Phil. 4:14—20.) He sows this good seed in a fruitful soil; and his "bountifulness" to man will assure him of the Lord's bountifulness to him. Whatever expenses therefore are retrenched, or from whatever fund it is deducted, we should not grudge or be grieved or sparing, in sowing this seed. It is spiritual policy for us to spend less on every kind of indulgence, and to lay by less for our families, that we may give more to the needy for Christ's sake: for this will be far the best secured and most productive. Even persons in moderate circumstances may sow much of this seed; if by various little savings and self-denials, they will but study to spare something to relieve their distressed brethren; and this they will do, if "faith and love abound in their hearts." With these truths before our eyes, men must be left to "do as they have purposed in their hearts:" for they who give in a reluctant, sorrowful, or grudging manner, and "of necessity," have little reason to expect the acceptance of God, "who loveth a cheerful giver." (Notes, Ec. 11:1—6.)

V. 8—15. There are a few Christians still to be found "who scatter, and yet increase;" but there are far more, even among those who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, "who withhold more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty:" for "God is able to make all grace to abound" to those, whose hearts are enlarged with kindness to their brethren; and it should be remembered, that he gives us every thing far more "freely," than we can give alms to the meanest beggar. If he sees it good for us, he can so prosper us, that, "having all-sufficiency in all things, we may abound unto every good work:" and they, who from love to him, "scatter abroad and give to the poor," have "a righteousness that endureth for ever." He can easily give us enough to use, and enough to disperse: that we may have more, sow more, and reap more; and so, "increase the fruits of our righteousness:" that, being "enriched in every thing unto all bountifulness," we may be happy in ourselves, blessings to others, and instruments of promoting his glory. But alas! the faithfulness of our God, in this respect, is little known, even among professed Christians, because so few fairly venture to make the experiment.—The Lord is pleased to try and purify many of his saints by poverty; and he proves others by employing them as his almoners. Their faithfulness and liberality, in this service, "not only supply the wants of the saints; but abound" in a large revenue of praise and thanksgiving to God. Their conduct in this respect evinces the sincerity of their own professed subjection to the gospel; and it stirs up many to pray for them, to long after them, and to admire and glorify God for his exceeding grace in them. Thus they adorn the gospel, animate the worship of believers, cement mutual love, and derive abundant blessings unto their own souls. While therefore we thank the Lord for "the unspeakable gift of his Son," to be our gracious Redeemer; through whom we poor sinners may perform such honourable and useful services, with assurance of acceptance and abundant recompense; let us endeavour to copy the example of Christ, by being unwearied in doing good, and by counting it "more blessed to give than to receive." (Notes, Acts 20:32—35. 1 Tim. 6:17—19.)

NOTES.—Chap. X. V. 1—6. Having concluded other subjects, the apostle here begins to speak more directly against the false teachers, who opposed him at Corinth. (Note, 11: 13—15.) Even he Paul, whom they reviled and despised, as not daring to assert his authority among them, (Notes, 1:15—20. 1 Cor. 4:18—21.) "besought them, by the meekness and gentleness," which Christ, though possessed of "all power in heaven and earth," had exercised towards his enemies, and which he required of his people; not to compel him to adopt measures apparently of a contrary nature. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Some indeed represented him as mean-spirited and abject, when present among them, for they disdained his lowly appearance and humble unassuming deportment: yet being absent he was bold towards them, and wrote as one who had resolved to vindicate and exert his apostolical authority. But before matters came to this extremity, he besought them, with all meekness and gentleness, not to constrain him to it; that he might not be "bold among them," with that kind of confidence, with which he was determined to proceed against certain persons who suspected and accused him, of conducting himself with carnal policy, and aiming at secular advantages and distinctions, in the execution of his sacred ministry. In this charge they included his fellow-labourers also; and, by such misrepresentations, they seduced the Christians at Corinth from their attachment to him and them. (Marg. Ref. c—g. Notes, 12:16—21.) But though he and his co-adjutors were liable to the manifold infirmities incident to the present mortal life, and were not exempt from imperfections, as "walking in the flesh," living in the body, and not being yet perfected in holiness: "they did not war" against sin and Satan, or appearance? [x]If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, [y]even so are we Christ's.

8 For [z]though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, [a]I should not be ashamed:

9 That I may not seem as if I would [b]terrify you by letters.

10 For his letters (say they) are weighty and powerful; [c]but his bodily presence is weak, [d]and his speech contemptible.

11 Let such a one think this, that such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, [e]such will we be also in deed when we are present.

12 For [f]we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they, measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, [f]are not wise.

13 But [g]we will not boast of things without our measure, but [h]according to the measure of the [i]rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you.

14 For [j]we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you; for we are come as far as to you also in preaching [k]the gospel of Christ:

15 Not [l]boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be [§]enlarged by you, according to our rule abundantly, conflict with their numerous opposers, according to the maxims of carnal policy, with craft and dissimulation, in dependence on their own wisdom and strength, or with an aim at their own interest or honour. (Notes, 1:12—14.) For "the weapons," which they employed in this spiritual "warfare were not carnal;" nor did they produce the effect by their own natural energy: but they were "mighty through God," whose power wrought by them, to demolish the "strong holds" of Satan, by which he had maintained his empire of darkness, idolatry, and wickedness in the world. For the preaching of the gospel, confirmed by miracles, and accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit, pulled down these strong holds, dispersed Satan's garrisons, delivered his captives, and subverted his authority; by diffusing the knowledge of God and his commandments and salvation among men. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, 4:7. Josh. 6:3—7. P. O. 1—14. Is. 30:23—25. Jer. 1:9,10. Matt. 12:29,30. Luke 11:21,22. Rom. 1:13—16. 15: 18—21. 1 Cor. 1:20—25. 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) Thus the ministers of Christ went on, casting down men's vain imaginations, presumptuous speculations, and carnal reasonings: exposing the falsehood and folly of that proud philosophy which led to skepticism and atheism, as well as of those fables which supported the stupid idolatry of the populace: and showing also the worthlessness of pharisaical forms and duties, and of every scheme of religion, which flattered men into a good opinion of themselves. So that their doctrine was rendered effectual to "cast down every high thing," every self-confident notion, every proud objection or ambitious purpose; and all that self-sufficiency, impenitence, obstinacy in rebellion, unbelief, and independence of spirit, which "exalted themselves" in men's hearts against the humbling holy knowledge, worship, and service of God: and enslaved men to idolatry, impiety, infidelity, and vice. When these were cast down, and a man was brought to "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," (Note, 4:3—6.) and to genuine repentance and faith; he found every imagination, reasoning, affection, and purpose of his heart, captivated by love to his divine Saviour: and, being thus conquered by grace and held captive by love, he became, by a sweet constraint, obedient to his teaching and command; and from his inmost soul, he was thenceforth the willing subject of Christ, in all his ordinances and commandments. (Marg. Ref. n—q.)—'The soul, seeing its fortifications demolished, submits to the Conqueror; and every thought, every reasoning, takes law from him.—Christ is acknowledged as absolute Master.—The former clause shows, how ready men are to fortify themselves against it; and to raise, as it were, one barrier behind another, to obstruct his entrance into the soul.' Doddridge.—As no outward miracle could effect this change, without new-creating grace; so we may be sure, that the power of God, in regenerating and renewing the heart, was principally, though not exclusively, intended by the apostle: yet many expositors almost wholly confine it to the miracles wrought by him.—Thus the apostle and his fellow-soldiers waged war against their opposers. By faithful preaching, disinterested labours, patient sufferings, holy lives, and fervent prayers, they sought to change their enemies into friends to them and their divine Master: and thus they prevailed against Satan, to the subversion of his strong holds and the revolt of his subjects.—Yet the apostle had another weapon, to use on some occasions; and this also was "mighty through God," to avenge his despised authority on his obstinate opposers. For he purposed, and was in readiness, by miraculous judgments, to avenge the cause of Christ on those disguised enemies, who persisted in their disobedience; as he had on Elymas and others: (Note, Acts 13:6—12.) but he waited to bring back such as had been deluded by them to their former obedience, and to complete that work of love, before he proceeded to use severer methods. (Marg. Ref. s, t.)—Many expositors seem to confine the interpretation of these verses almost entirely to the divine power, by which the apostles were enabled to confound all open opposers, as well as to inflict judgments on those professed Christians, who by their persevering misconduct exposed themselves to the censures of the church. But it appears evident, that "the gospel, as the power of God unto salvation," is primarily intended; and that the conversion of opponents, and the restoring of lapsed Christians to obedience, were the first objects aimed at. But when all proper means had failed in respect of the latter, then not so much the censures of the church, as miraculous punishments denounced by apostolical authority, and made effectual by the power of God, were the weapons to which they had recourse. V. 7—11. Some of the Corinthians had been seduced into an ill opinion of Paul, on account of his mean appearance, indigent circumstances, and exterior disadvantages: but would they continue to regard outward appearances, which had no connexion with real excellency? Or would they value men on account of external accomplishments, plausibility, and self-confidence? If any man, among those who opposed him, was confident, that he was a disciple and minister of Christ: let him consider that Paul and his brethren were so likewise: and then he would perceive, that he had no ground of self-preference. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) Indeed Paul might have boasted something further of his apostolical authority which the Lord in his special favour, had given him for "the edification" of the church, and the salvation of souls, and "not for their destruction:" though no doubt, this might be occasioned by it in some instances; but the effect would be contrary to its genuine tendency, and the use which he had made of it. (Note, 2:14—17.) Nor could this claim of pre-eminence, if he had more decidedly advanced it, have made him ashamed: as it was sufficiently authenticated by his miracles, conduct and success in his ministry; and the effects of it would soon be felt by the refractory party at Corinth. Yet he had rather waive this topic, than enlarge on his power to punish opposers that he might not appear disposed to terrify them by his epistles. For some ventured to say, that his epistles were written with much apparent weight of argument, and power of conviction, and contained the language of authority and firmness but that "his bodily presence was weak" and feeble, and his elocution "contemptible." (Marg. Ref. c—d.) It is recorded, (I determine not how truly,) that the apostle was of low stature, crooked, and bald: some add that he had an impediment in his speech, that his voice was shrill and unpleasant, and his delivery ungraceful. (Notes, 12:7—10. 1 Cor. 2:3—5. Gal. 4:12—16.) However this might be, for probably it is not quite correct, his scrupulous rejection of the studied ornaments of the Grecian eloquence, and his plain, modest, and unaffected address, would render "his speech contemptible with many persons at Corinth" where these decorations were highly valued: though his subjects were ever so judiciously discussed, and his delivery every way suitable to the occasion. Indeed, the very meanness of his appare would render his appearance despised by numbers. But as he warned such as ventured to speak thus of him, to expect that he would act as decidedly when he arrived at Corinth, as he now wrote: and would show them, that he was able to assume a firmer tone, and act with more authority, and even severity, when he saw occasion; though he preferred "beseeching them in the meekness and gentleness of Christ." V. 12—16. The favourers of the false teachers, at Corinth, might think it presumption in Paul to rank himself with such wise, eminent, and eloquent men as they were: and he seems in an ironical manner, to refer to this opinion. But he assured them that he could not conscientiously copy their example of ostentatious boastings and self-commendation: for they, by "measuring themselves," and their endowments and performances with their own erroneous judgment of excellency, and with those of each other, and thus "comparing themselves with themselves," without bringing their characters, gifts, and ministry, to the proper standard, plainly proved that they were defective in wisdom and knowledge, and far from the way of attaining them. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Prov. 26:12. Is. 5:21. Luke 18:9—14. Rom. 12:3—5. Phil. 2:1—4.) But the apostle and his friends would not boast of their qualifications or services, in this vague and immeasurable manner; but would speak of them, with reference to the true standard, even that "rule" or line, which marked out the services to which the providence and commandment of the Lord had called them. This "measure," as it respected Paul, "the apostle of the Gentiles," had reached even as far as Corinth. For he had not stretched himself beyond his commission, or left his work in other places from haste to come to them, though not within the line of duty, as the false teachers had done; but, proceeding regularly in his work of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, he had at length come as far as to them; and had been the first who taught them the way of salvation. (Marg. Ref. g—k.)—It appears from the history, that to this time Achaia had been the boundary of the apostle's labours in Europe.—He did not therefore boast of interfering with services, which lay beyond the line of his present duty, or seek the credit of "other men's labours;" as their false teachers had done, by intruding among them and perverting them. (Notes, Matt. 13:24—30,36—43. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Gal. 6:11—14.) On the contrary he hoped, when their faith should be increased even by means of these events, and he could safely leave them to their ordinary teachers, that he should be so "magnified" and helped forward by them, as to proceed with abundant success, to preach the gospel in other parts of the Peloponnesus, or even in the more remote regions of Italy and Spain: according to his rule of labouring for the conversion of the Gentiles, without interfering with the duty marked out to other men or "boasting of things made ready to his hand," as if he had actually performed them. (Note, Rom. 15:18—21.)—'To the apostles God allotted the charge of converting the world; and endued them with gifts suited to the greatness of the work. To them therefore it belonged to form their converts into churches, and to appoint rules for their government. ... The province assigned to the evangelists, and other inferior ministers, was to assist the apostles; to build upon the foundation laid by them; to labour in the gospel under their direction; and in all things to consider themselves as subordinate to the apostles. According to this view of the matter, the false teacher at Corinth, who was but at best an inferior minister of the gospel, had in many things acted out of the bounds in which he ought to have laboured.' Macknight. Κανων is the instrument by which builders try their work, whether exactly straight or not. V. 17, 18. 'If any teacher boast, let him boast of having performed his duty, in the manner the Lord hath appointed.' Macknight. Surely this is widely different from "glorying in the Lord!" (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Jer. 9:23,24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, vv. 30,31.)—The apostle was constrained to speak of his own labours and success: but he must remind the Corinthians, that every man who "gloried," ought "to glory in God," as his Portion: and in the Lord Jesus as his whole Salvation, and the giver of all his hopes, grace, endowments, and usefulness; to whom all the honour of them was due. If a man could not thus "glory in the Lord," all other glorying must be vain-glory, and end in shame and misery. For that man was not to be considered as "approved," in respect of his Christian profession or ministry, who could speak eloquently and plausibly in his own commendation: but he, to whose faithfulness the Lord himself bare testimony, and whose services he commended, by employing him as his instrument for good to many souls, and by giving him the gracious earnests of final acceptance and commendation. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)—Many expositors suppose, that the commendation here mentioned was given when God enabled a man to work miracles, or exercise spiritual gifts. But many wrought miracles and prophesied, who were "workers of iniquity;" (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) and it could not be properly said, that "the Lord commended" them. The evident usefulness of a minister's labours, is a less equivocal testimony; yet the final account, the "Well done, good and faithful servant," and "the rejoicing in the testimony of conscience" in the mean while, seem especially intended. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. They who meet with unjust and ungrateful usage from those, to whom they are labouring to do good, should frequently and intensely meditate on "the meekness and gentleness of Christ." As he was reviled and despised by those whom he came to save; and among whom he wrought his miracles of love and mercy, "going about doing good;" none need wonder, or be discouraged, at meeting with a similar "contradiction of sinners," in their work and labour of "love." (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) They should then endeavour to go on patiently and quietly, after his example, and to "overcome evil with good:" and, even when constrained by duty to reprove and correct, or to exercise authority with firmness and decision, they should do it with reluctance, show a desire to avoid the painful necessity, and manifest a loving and forgiving spirit, that all may see how dear "the meekness and gentleness of Christ" are to them.—Ministers should be careful to avoid all appearance and to obviate all suspicion, of "walking according to the flesh:" and those who falsely accuse them of so doing will expose themselves to the displeasure of God. Though encompassed with infirmities and temptations, and subject to manifold imperfections, the servants of Christ are engaged in a warfare which cannot be waged "after the flesh." Worldly wisdom, affected eloquence, dissimulation, compulsion, angry disputation, slanders, revilings, and ridicule, are carnal weapons: and, however powerful they may seem to numbers, they will be found useless as straw and stubble in this war; and rather fortify and garrison Satan's strong-holds, than pull them down. For success against the kingdom of darkness must be expected, "not from might, or power, but from the Spirit of God." The appointed means, however feeble they appear to unbelief, will be "mighty through God." His power accompanying the blowing of trumpets at his command, cast down the walls of Jericho far more speedily and entirely than any engines of war could have demolished them. And "the preaching of the cross," by men of faith and prayer, has always been most fatal to the strong-holds of idolatry, infidelity, impiety, and wickedness. Men may, if they be able, give energy to means of their own inventing; while Satan derides their puny efforts, and "takes them captive at his will." But God works by his own appointments: by his power the enemy is driven from his fortifications, men's "imaginations" are cast down, their "reasonings" and objections silenced, their pride abased, their illusions dissipated; the knowledge of God finds admission into the mind; reverential fear, repentance, humility, faith, love, and gratitude follow; and the whole soul, with all its faculties and operations, is at length "captivated to the obedience of Christ." Thus he makes "his people willing in the day of his power," and gradually perfects them in obedience and in the beauties of holiness. Yet while the gracious Saviour is ever ready to forgive, and delights in mercy; he is "in readiness to avenge the disobedience" of the impenitent and unbelieving, especially that of hypocrites and false teachers, who corrupt the church and dishonour his name; and he will at length "make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath."

V. 7—18. It is peculiarly unsuitable to the character of Christians, though lamentably common, to judge of men, or look upon things, after "the outward appearance:" as if learning, eloquence, affluence, a graceful person and address, or elegant attire, were evidences of a man's holiness and heavenly wisdom, or the seal of Christ to his ministerial character! Or as if the want of such embellishments proved a man not to be an eminent Christian or an able faithful minister of the lowly Saviour! Even Paul was "base," in the judgment of the self-sufficient and accomplished Corinthians: and though "his letters were weighty and powerful, yet his bodily presence was weak, and his speech contemptible;" so that Satan's emissaries far excelled him in exterior recommendations. This should teach us not to judge of gold merely by its glitter, in which tinsel often exceeds it; but to bring it to the balance and weigh it.—When professors or preachers of the gospel are so confident that they belong to Christ, that they can hardly allow those who do not coincide in their views, or sanction their conduct, to be Christians; and when they treat the most approved characters with supercilious contempt and revilings: their very confidence should excite our suspicions: for it far more accords to that of "the deceitful workers" at Corinth, than to that of St. Paul and his fellow-labourers, which was modest, humble, and candid. The great apostle of the Gentiles, when constrained to mention "the authority, which the Lord had given him, for edification and not for destruction," and which he used in the most wise and excellent manner, and with the most blessed success; spake of it with reserve, lest he should seem to boast, or to threaten. Whereas some men appear to be entirely out of their element, when they are not boasting of themselves, and menacing divine judgments on all who oppose them; as if they would terrify every one into silence and submission. Let us not "dare to make ourselves of that number," or "to compare ourselves with those who thus commend themselves:" let us leave them to expose their own want of wisdom, humility, and charity, by "measuring themselves by themselves," and all other men by their own standard; "boasting of themselves, without measure" or decency; "intruding into other men's labours," "glorying in things made ready to their hands," and neglecting their own work, that they may spoil that of other men. But we should humbly "compare ourselves" with the word of God, and the example of prophets and apostles; and "measure ourselves by the rule" of our duty, the obligations conferred upon us, and the work assigned us: we should be diligent, and "study, yea, be ambitious, to be quiet and mind our own business," though in an obscure situation; and thankful for success, according to the measure and rule which God has distributed to us; whether called to preach the gospel, or to serve Christ in any other way; without intermeddling with other men's labours, or boasting in services performed by them. We ought likewise to hope for the increase of the faith and grace, even of those who have most failed in their duty to us; to be zealous and bold, in a humble, patient, prudent, loving and self-denying manner, and rather to be desirous of doing abundant good, than of acquiring great reputation. Finally, let us remember to glory in the Lord our Salvation, and in all other things, only as evidences of his love, or as means of promoting his glory: and, instead of commending ourselves, or seeking the praise of men; let us desire and aspire after "that honour, which cometh from God only."

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle excuses his self-commendation; because he used it out of "godly jealousy" over those at Corinth, whom he had espoused to Christ; lest false teachers should pervert them, as Satan did Eve, 1—3. Their new teachers had not preached another Saviour, or another Spirit, or another gospel, than he had done, 4. He was not at all inferior to the "chiefest apostles," for though "rude in speech," he was not so "in knowledge," 5, 6. He declined being chargeable to the Corinthians, not from want of love, but to counteract his opposers, 7—12; who were "false apostles, ministers of Satan," though apparently "ministers of righteousness;" even as "Satan transforms himself into an angel of light," 13—15. As many gloried, and were borne with, even while over-bearing and rapacious; he would, though reluctantly, "glory also," 16—20. A most extraordinary account of his abundant labours, dangers, sufferings, and deliverances, 21—33.

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1—6. The apostle admitted, that in general self-commendation implied folly: yet the case required it of him at that time; and his zeal for the honour of Christ, as well as his love to souls, rendered him an exception to ordinary rules. He therefore desired and prayed, that the Christians at Corinth might show a disposition "to bear with him a little," in what they deemed "his folly;" he must, however, venture all consequences; and they must bear with him, whetner they approved or disapproved of it. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) For he was "jealous over them, with" that fervent love and anxious solicitude for their welfare, which sprang from zeal for the glory of God and regard to his authority. He had solicited and obtained their consent, to that sacred and blessed union with Christ, which might be called their espousals to the One "Bridegroom" and Husband of the church; to whom alone their devoted, faithful, and obedient affection belonged, and from whom all their felicity should be expected. He therefore feared every thing, which tended to alienate, weaken, and divide their attachment to him; or pollute them, either in body or mind: for his ambition was to present them to Christ at last, "holy, unblameable, and unreproveable in his sight;" as "a chaste virgin" is presented to her intended husband, when the marriage is completed. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) But he feared lest, by any means, the false teachers should draw them aside from simple dependence on Christ and obedient love to him, into a false confidence, carnal affections, or disobedience. Lest they should be deluded from that purity of doctrine, that spiritual frame of mind, and that honourable conduct, which became this high relation: even "as Eve" in Eden was beguiled by Satan, in the form of a serpent, to seek happiness in departing from God, and disobeying him; being deceived by specious and subtle pretences and insinuations. (Marg. Ref. h—l. Notes, Gen. 3:1—6. Rev. 12:7—12, v. 9.) The Corinthians were peculiarly exposed to this danger, from those who puffed them up with an idea of their extraordinary knowledge; and seduced them, by artful reasonings, to seek liberty and pleasure in other things, besides obeying God, and walking with him. Indeed, if any man could possibly have preached "another Jesus," a more gracious and precious Saviour than Paul had declared to them; or could have conferred on them "another Spirit," whose gifts and influences were more excellent than those, which the Holy Spirit, through Paul's ministry, had bestowed on them; or if "another" and more suitable "gospel had been preached, than that which they had embraced;" there might have been some reason for their bearing with the new teachers, or even preferring them. Yet, even in that case, it would have become them, to have borne with the infirmities of their first instructer in Christianity. But the contrary was manifest: for, whatever they might think, he was conscious that he was in no respect inferior to any of the apostles, without excepting Peter, James, or John who seemed to be the chief of them all: (Marg. Ref. m—p. Note, Gal. 2:6—10.) he might, therefore, well be confident, that their new teachers could add nothing valuable to the instructions which he had given. He had indeed appeared among them "rude in speech," and as a person of ordinary education, ignorant of the rules of eloquence, and careless respecting them: (this might be the case, though his discourses were replete with natural pathos, and sound argument:) yet he had shown himself competent in knowledge, to instruct his hearers in every part of Christianity.—St. Paul's declaration, that he "was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles," when carried to its consequences, is totally subversive of the enormous baseless fabric of popery; which rests entirely (as distinguished from the rest of the professed Christian church,) on the vain imagination, that Peter was supreme over all the apostles; and that the pope, or the Roman church, or both, inherit in some unaccountable manner, and by some unknown title, that supremacy.—Many expositors suppose, that the expressions, used by the apostle in respect of his espousing the believers at Corinth to Christ, are taken from Grecian customs: but the language of the Old Testament seems referred to. (Notes, Ps. 45:9—17. Cant. 1:2. Is. 54:5—10. 62:1—5. Ez. 16:9—14. Hos. 2:18—20. John 3:27—36, v. 29.) Others conclude, that one false teacher, and he a Jew, was the author of the disturbances at Corinth. But the false teachers (Note, 13—15.) seem to have corrupted the gospel rather with heathenism, than Judaism. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5: 6: 8: 10:18—31. 11:17—34.)

because he had "abased himself," in working as a tent-maker for his maintenance, and submitting to many privations and self-denials, that they might "be exalted" to the privileges of God's people, by his preaching the gospel to them, without putting them to any expense? (Marg. Ref. t.) Indeed he had done this, lest he should prejudice their minds; and he might, in some sense, be said even to have "robbed other churches," by receiving money of them for his subsistence, while he was labouring for the benefit of the Corinthians. And when he had really been in want among them, he neither ceased from his ministry through discouragement, nor yet put them to any charge: but the Christians from Macedonia, especially from Philippi, supplied him with what was absolutely necessary. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Note, Phil. 4:10—20.) Thus "in all things he had kept himself from being burdensome to them;" nay, he saw cause to determine that he would continue to do so: and as surely as "the truth of Christ was in him," and he faithfully preached it; (Note, 1: 23,24.) he was resolved, that no man, by entreaties, arguments, or reproaches, should ever take from him this ground of glorying; and that he would receive nothing towards his maintenance, from any one through all the regions of Achaia. If the reason of this fixed purpose were demanded, or if any should impute it to his want of love: he would appeal to God, who well knew his tender affection for them. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 12:11—15.) But, indeed, he was resolved to proceed in his present conduct, that he might deprive those of the "occasion" of slandering him, who were ready to seize on every handle against him; (Note, 5:9—12.) and to set them a good example, that, in respect of zeal for the honour of Christ and love of the church, in which they gloried, they might be shown in what manner to make good their pretensions; and learn that the self-denial and disinterestedness of the apostle constituted a far more unequivocal evidence of zeal and affection, than their plausible harangues, joined with a selfish and domineering conduct. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Note, Acts 20:32—35.) It is generally supposed, that the false teachers affected the praise of preaching the gospel freely: but the language, which the apostle afterwards uses, clearly proves that this was not the case. (20) They seem rather to have despised Paul, as degrading himself, and as acting inconsistently with the dignity of an apostle, in labouring, and enduring poverty instead of demanding a maintenance.—As Corinth was a rich city, his long continuance there might have been ascribed to mercenary motives, had he not adopted this plan: (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:1—23.) and as the Christians in Macedonia, though far poorer than the Corinthians, yet in part maintained the apostle when labouring at Corinth; it might in some sense be said, that they were robbed to exalt their more prosperous brethren.

V. 13—15. It was not to be expected that the persons, to whom St. Paul referred, would in this respect be found like him; as they were indeed "false apostles," who in a lying manner pretended to be sent by Christ; in this and other things "working deceitfully," acting with duplicity, and varnishing over their hypocrisy and selfish intentions, by specious professions: so that their style, manner, and conduct were an affected imitation of those of the apostles; but their ministry tended to dishonour God, and to deceive souls. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, 2:14—17. 4:1,2. Jer. 23:13—27. Ez. 13:1—16. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) Nor need it excite wonder, that such wicked men should be so specious in their appearance and pretensions; for even Satan, their master, could disguise himself, and tempt men in the form of a holy angel, a messenger from the world of light, instead of appearing as the prince of darkness. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Matt. 4:3,4 16:21—23. Gal. 1:6—10.) He can delude men with professions of extraordinary illumination, high affections, evangelical truth, revelations, singular sanctity, deadness to the world, austerity, or sublimity of devotion, and in various other ways: that so he might undermine or disgrace the whole religion of Christ; hurry men into absurdities and extravagances; lead them to neglect the plain rule of the written word; and change them into enthusiasts, antinomians, or superstitious formalists. It was not therefore "any thing great," or difficult, or "marvellous," that "his ministers should be transformed," and assume the appearance of "the ministers of righteousness;" that by them this chief deceiver might impose on men to their destruction: or if they appeared openly, as opposers of the gospel and patrons of vice and impiety, they could not do near so much mischief: even as depredators succeed best, when disguised like honest men, and reputed to be such. But, whatever their professions might be, and however they might be admired and applauded; yet their end would accord not to their popularity, confidence, eloquence, or sentiments; but to their works, their conduct in the sight of God, and the effect of their principles among men. (Note, Matt. 7:15—20.) The plural number used in these verses, in which the apostle directly speaks out on a subject to which he had all along covertly referred, does by no means favour the opinion, that one false teacher was exclusively meant: though one might possess greater influence than the others.

V. 16—20. Having thus openly decided against those who persisted in opposing his authority at Corinth, the apostle returned to his subject. He desired that no one would "think him a fool," or a vainglorious man, on account of what he had said in his own behalf, when the importance of the occasion peremptorily demanded it of him: yet, if they would form so unfavourable a conclusion, let them at least receive him in that character, while "he boasted himself a little," for a short time, and as to a few things in which he was really distinguished: for he sought their good and not his own credit, in what he said. He did not indeed speak on this occasion, according to the general precepts or example of the Lord, or what was proper to be imitated in ordinary cases; nor was it an immediate revelation which he was about to declare: but he followed that "same confidence of boasting," which their conduct had imposed upon him, and which the example of some among them seemed to authorize; though they would perhaps deem it foolish in him to do it. As, however, many of them, both the deceivers and the deceived, were in this habit of "glorying after the flesh," "he would glory also;" but on other grounds and in another manner, in order to counteract the pernicious tendency of their vain confidence. (Marg. Ref. x.) Well satisfied with their own wisdom, they were accustomed to bear, with a self-complacent joy, the conduct of those who acted foolishly; and had, no doubt, often looked down on him with this mixture of pity and contempt. (Note, 1 Cor. 4:6—13.) Yet they had not greatly shown their wisdom, in bearing with the false teachers: for they endured it without complaint, at least without being undeceived, if any one brought them into an abject dependence on him, and enslaved their consciences to his unwarranted impositions: if he devoured their substance, (as the Pharisees did the widows' houses,) by exorbitant demands under covert specious pretexts; if he took money from them by way of presents; if he exalted himself as some absolute ruler over them, and behaved in the most insolent manner; nay, if he even smote them on the face, as treating them with contempt and disdain, in his ungoverned passions. Doubtless, this refers to facts known to the apostle, in which the violent, litigious, ambitious, selfish, temper of the "false apostles," had been evident to all men: yet they were still allowed to retain their influence, through the fascination of their eloquence, and confidence, and the crafty management of their deluded admirers! (Marg. Ref. z—c. Note, Matt. 5:38—42.) Glory after the flesh.] This is by most expositors, without any proof, explained of the false teachers glorying in their Jewish extraction, and in circumcision. But the expression, "after the flesh," according to the apostle's language, implies every thing which an unregenerate man can possess; so that learning, eloquence, and various other distinctions may be meant; whether Jewish extraction and circumcision be included or not. (Notes, 10:1—6,17,18. Is. 40:6—8. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. 3:18—22. Phil. 3:1—7. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)—ʷ If subjection to the Jewish rites had been that which the apostle was so zealous against; he would have spoken more plainly and warmly as we see in the epistle to the Galatians; and not have touched it only by the bye slightly, in a doubtful expression. Besides, it is plain, that no such thing was yet attempted openly: only St. Paul was afraid of it.' Locke.

V. 21—23. The apostle referred, in what he had said, to the reproach which these deceivers had cast on him and his friends; as if he had been weak and timid in his conduct at Corinth. They ascribed his modesty, meekness, and self-abasement to a want of courage, or to a consciousness that he had no apostolical authority, and no power to enforce his decisions. Yet in whatever particular any man was bold, as a Christian, a minister, or an apostle, "he was bold also." This he must maintain, though he thus did what on other occasions would be foolish. Commentators generally suppose that in what follows, he meant to compare himself with the false teacher, or teachers, at Corinth; and infer, that these were Hebrews, and wanted to impose the law on the Gentile converts; of which no trace is found in either epistle. (Note, 12:17—21.) But I apprehend that the whole passage will appear far more natural and animated, if we understand it with reference to "the very chiefest of the" true "apostles;" and the words, "whereinsoever any is bold," obviously lead to this interpretation. (Note, 1—6.) It would have been a very small matter for him to show, that he was superior to the "ministers of Satan," whom he had just condemned. But in order to re-establish completely his apostolical authority, he must prove, that he was not "a whit behind the chiefest apostles" and in fact he here shows, that he laboured and suffered more abundantly than they all, or than any of them did. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:3—11, vv. 10,11.) All the apostles were descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They were neither Hellenists nor proselytes; and Paul was not inferior to them in this respect; though his birth at Tarsus might give some persons occasion to conclude that he was. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, Phil. 3:1—7.) He had declared that his opposers at Corinth were not "ministers of Christ," but of Satan; (Note, 13—15.) and he could scarcely seem to speak "foolishly," in magnifying his office, and declaring that he was more than they: but it had indeed this appearance, when he proceeded to show, that in some respects he was more distinguished, as the minister of Christ, than any other person, even among the apostles themselves: not by superior authority, abilities, miraculous powers, zeal, or holiness; but by his more abundant labours and sufferings, in which he evidently far exceeded all other "ministers of Christ" on earth. The false apostles had laboured comparatively very little; and, instead of suffering for the gospel, it is very probable that they had risen to eminence, affluence, and authority, by means of it: but by thus showing himself, in these things, to be distinguished above all the other apostles, he tacitly pointed out to the false teachers and their followers, in what true pre-eminence consisted; and by the contrast made it appear, that those things in which they gloried, were indeed their shame. (Marg. Ref. i—m. Note, Matt. 20:24—28.)—I speak as a fool. (23) "I speak as one exceeding in folly." This confirms the above interpretation.—In prisons, &c.] (Marg. Ref. n. Note, 1 Cor. 15:31—34.) This occurred before Paul's imprisonment at Jerusalem, Cæsarea, and Rome. (Acts 22:—28:)

V. 24—27. The other apostles had indeed been scourged and imprisoned for Christ's sake: (Notes, Acts 4:1—3. 5:17—25,40.) yet Paul had endured this pain and disgrace "more frequently" than they, and had been in danger of death on far more occasions. The Jews had scourged him five times, with the utmost severity of which their law and custom allowed; for they were forbidden to exceed forty stripes, and for fear of a mistake, they always confined themselves to thirty-nine. (Note, Deut. 25:2,3.) He had also been thrice scourged by the command of the Roman magistrates, though contrary to their law. (Notes, Acts 16:19—40.) He had once been stoned, and left for dead; but had been miraculously restored to life. (Notes, Acts 14:19,20. 2 Tim. 3:10—12.) He had thrice been shipwrecked in his different voyages; and at one time he continued a night and a day in the sea, probably on a part of the wreck, in much suffering and peril. This was previous to his voyage to Rome, when he was again shipwrecked. (Notes, Acts 27:) Indeed, his other sufferings, recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, from the nineteenth chapter to the end, were subsequent to the writing of this epistle: and hence we may perceive, how very many of his trials and sufferings, as well as of his labours, with the success of them, are no where recorded, save in the book of God's remembrance.—He often journeyed from one region to another amidst hardships and perils: sometimes his life had been endangered in passing rapid rivers, or deep waters, which lay in his way; sometimes by robbers, who attempted to plunder and murder him. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, Acts 20:1—6.) Frequently the Jews assaulted him, being enraged by his preaching to the Gentiles; then the Gentiles attempted to slay him, because his doctrine undermined their idolatry. (*Marg. When he was in any city, his life was in danger from the violence of the multitude, or the iniquity of the rulers; when in journeying he passed deserts, the wild beasts, or wicked men, that infested them, exposed him to equal peril; when crossing the sea he was in danger of pirates and tempests; and even when among professed Christians, he was "in peril from false brethren." Thus his life was spent in weariness, pain, and suffering; his incessant labour in preaching the gospel, conversing with the people from house to house, writing his epistles, earning his bread, and attending to his devotions, frequently forced him to pass whole nights without rest. Often he was exposed to hunger and thirst through extreme indigence; and when he had food, his labours and religious duties led him to abstain from it. He was sometimes exposed to cold, from the inclemency of the weather, and want of proper accommodations; and often had not suitable and decent raiment to cover him, when he was called to appear in public. Yet he still persevered, without fainting, in his "work of faith and labour of love." (Marg. Ref. z—b. Notes, 6:3—10. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.)

V. 28—31. Beside the things above mentioned, which "were without," and mainly related to the apostle's bodily sufferings; his mind was worn down by a multiplicity of affairs, which came upon him daily, with the force of a multitude; by the care of all the churches of the Gentiles planted by him and others. This lay upon him, filled him with constant solicitude, and employed him perpetually, in forming and executing plans to promote their peace and prosperity, to counteract the designs of false teachers, and to order all their concerns for the best. (Marg. Ref. d, e.) And in this he so cordially engaged, that he was attentive to the case even of individuals: so that he might ask, What single Christian in all the churches was reported to him, as weak in the faith, and liable to be discouraged, with whom he did not sympathize as "weak also?" or who was stumbled and turned aside; and he was not fired with zeal to recover him, and with a holy indignation against those who occasioned the evil? (Marg. Ref. f, g.) As it was become necessary for him "to glory;" so he had taken care, in glorying, not to expatiate on his gifts, or the honours which he had received; but on those things which showed his exposed, despised, and suffering condition; the infirmities of his body and mind; his continual need of divine support; his persecutions, reproaches, and deliverances, and such things as implied his weakness, and "the power of Christ which rested on him." Nor did he in this at all exceed strict truth, as those who gloried were apt to do: for "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," to whom the glory and praise belonged of all that was done by him and for him, was witness that he did not lie in any particular, or in any measure. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.—The ministers of the gospel must on some occasions submit to the imputations of "folly," rather than omit any thing which is requisite for the good of souls: and when their hearers think their conduct in particular cases indiscreet, they should bear with them; especially if it evidently spring from an excess of zeal and love. They may be "jealous over" the people, with such an affectionate earnestness, as carries them beyond ordinary rules or personal considerations; while they apprehend that their beloved children are in danger of being, by any means, "corrupted from the simplicity of Christ:" and that conduct, which many censure, may be the effect of pure and holy affections superior to those of other men. It is their grand employment and object, to promote the espousals of souls to Christ; and to preserve those who appear to be thus espoused, from corruption in their principles, spirit, or conduct; that they may "present them as a chaste virgin unto Christ." This will excite in them a jealous fear, lest Satan, who in "the serpent by his subtlety beguiled Eve" in paradise, should deceive them also. For he has agents of all descriptions, who are continually and artfully imposing upon the unstable and unwary. If then the faithful minister seem over suspicious, and become troublesome by his watchfulness and warnings; his people ought notwithstanding to bear with him.—When any are about voluntarily to leave those pastors, by whom they seem to have been espoused to Christ; they ought to inquire, Whether their new favourites can preach another Jesus, another Sanctifier, or another gospel, than those which they have already received. And they should not endure those who, without sufficient cause, would alienate them from the instruments of God in their conversion.—Christians need not wonder, if confident persons represent their faithful pastors as inferior preachers, who are destitute of erudition, eloquence, and power; or in some respects exceptionable or erroneous: as there were not wanting "deceivers," who confidently said the same things of blessed Paul himself. But it is far better to be "rude in speech, yet not in" spiritual and experimental "knowledge;" and to be manifested thoroughly in all things, as walking consistently with the gospel, than to be admired by thousands for "excellency of speech;" and to be lifted up in pride, to corrupt the church with heresies, to distract it by furious contentions, and disgrace the gospel, by fierce or malignant tempers and an unholy life. So exceedingly injudicious are many professed Christians, that high confidence, and the language of importance and authority, often go further than the most humble, meek, unassuming, and disinterested deportment! The minister, who is content to be poor, to fare hardly, to "be abased," or to earn his bread, that he "may exalt others" by freely preaching the gospel to them; is often consigned to neglect as if guilty of some great offence! While others who assume a magisterial tone, and exalt themselves, are admitted to that consequence which they assume; provided they have popular abilities, whatever their character in other respects may be. Yet it is in reality an honour to endure want; without ceasing to labour, or desiring to "become chargeable," where it might prejudice men against the gospel. On some occasions, a man should determine not to be deprived of "this glorying;" especially if he at any time judge himself required to mention it. Thus the "appearance of evil" may be avoided, the mouths of gainsayers may be stopped, an edifying example may be exhibited, and a contrast made to the conduct of mercenary deceivers. This, however, must be done in love and humility, and as in the presence of God: and it may sometimes be proper to show, that it does not result from pride, by receiving the kindness of others with grateful acknowledgments, where the same reasons do not operate. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:15,16,20—25. 8:9.) It often happens in this way, that ministers "receive wages," as it were, from one set of people, to do service for another; and sometimes the poorer are at the expense of maintaining those who preach to the rich. But the minister needs not scruple this, as if "he robbed other churches;" it reflects no dishonour on him, provided he only receive a decent subsistence; and it will redound to the credit and profit of those who thus supply him: yet when rich professors of the gospel know this to be the case, they are not even just if they do not bear the burden themselves; nor generous if they do not copy so noble an example.

V. 13—20. Whatever fair show deceivers may make, they will seldom even appear like faithful ministers, in labouring without any hope of worldly advantage or honour, from pure love to Christ and the souls of men. This is a part of the apostolical character and office, which by no means accords to the designs of "false apostles and deceitful workers."

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle relates extraordinary revelations made to him; which had rendered such humiliating and distressing experiences necessary, as constrained him to glory, only in his own infirmities and trials, and in the all-sufficient power and grace of Christ, 1—10. As his apostleship had been fully proved, the Corinthians ought to have commended him, and not to have compelled him to self-commendation, 11—13. He was about to visit them again; but was determined to adhere to his disinterested conduct; and to spend himself in fervent love to them, though they should on that very account love him the less, 14, 15. He shows that those, whom he had sent to them, had acted in the same disinterested manner, 16—19; and expresses his fears, that he should be humbled, as well as compelled to use severity; by finding many who had grossly offended, and had not repented, 20, 21.

IT is not [a]expedient for me doubtless [b]to glory. I will come to [c]visions and revelations of the Lord.

2 I [d]knew a man [e]in Christ about fourteen years ago, (whether [f]in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: [g]God knoweth;) such a one [h]caught up to the [i]third heaven.

3 And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;)

4 How that he was caught up into [k]paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not [l]lawful for a man to utter.

5 Of [i]such a one will I glory: [m]yet of myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities.

6 For though [n]I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool: for [o]I will say the truth: but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me [p]above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me.

7 And [q]lest I should be exalted above measure

[a]The plausibility of deceivers, and the attractive form which they assume, to seduce men "from the simplicity of Christ," should not excite our wonder; for Satan is continually "transformed into an angel of light," that, under the most specious pretences, he may fill the earth with infidelity, heresy, and ungodliness: and, under the mask of philosophy, morality, or extraordinary austerity, superstition, enthusiasm, or new revelations, he does far more extensive and permanent mischief, than merely by tempting men to gross enormities. It might therefore have been previously supposed, that some of "his ministers transformed into ministers of righteousness," would be inspired to copy his example; but if "their end" were to be according to their abilities, confidence, or notions, they would have a far better prospect before them, than they now can have, when it must be "according to their works." If then any of them could indeed vacate the law of God, the rule of duty, and the standard of sin and holiness, they would secure an important point; but they will find it in full force at the day of judgment: the believer's works, as evidential of his faith and love, will be tried and approved by it; and they, who have habitually done evil under the profession of the gospel, will be condemned as hypocrites. But there is an equal danger on the other side, and it serves Satan's purposes nearly as well, to set up good works against the righteousness and atonement of Christ, and against salvation by faith and grace. In short, the ministers of Satan will be permitted to preach any doctrine, except the holy law of God, as established by faith in Christ, by regeneration and sanctification of the Holy Spirit: but this is the bane of every false system, and, when clearly exhibited, detects Satan, however "transformed into an angel of light."—We have great reason for thankfulness, that the apostle was constrained, though with many retractations, to "boast himself a little:" for, whatever he might fear, or his enemies might say, his "confidence in boasting" has thrown such light on his ministry, character, and history, as will be instructive to the church to the end of the world. Doubtless the Holy Spirit guided his pen, though he seemed not to "speak after the Lord;" for he did not glory in a carnal, a proud, or a false manner, as many do. Had the Corinthians been as wise as they thought themselves, he would have had no occasion to apologize to them for his conduct; for he did not require those indulgences, which they granted to their false teachers.—Indeed, if faithful ministers, who flatter no man, and pay no court to any man's passions, should attempt to treat their people, as some do, who for their own ends are in other things more complaisant, it would never be endured. It is astonishing, to see how some men bring their followers into bondage; how "they devour and take of them;" how they insult and reproach them, as well as others; and yet how all this is borne with, excused, or palliated. For indeed their doctrine suits the lives and consciences of their hearers, and their example encourages them to similar conduct towards others. Sometimes it may be necessary to take notice of the reproaches of such men, but we must never imitate their spirit or conduct.

V. 21—33. What mere man ever united such and so many grounds "of glorying," as this apostle did? How does it fill our minds with astonishment, to meditate on this brief enumeration of his labours, hardships, perils, and sufferings, during a long course of years; of his patience, perseverance, diligence, cheerfulness, and usefulness, in the midst of them: and of his attentive and fervent affection towards all the churches, and every individual believer! Next to the history of Christ himself; the dangers, persecutions, cruelty, and treachery, which this most excellent and most useful servant of God, every where, and from all sorts of persons, met with; and the unkindness even of his own converts, form the severest stricture on the folly and wickedness of mankind, that ever was published.—We may here see what are the chief preferments in the true church of Christ: and we may ask ourselves, Whether on such terms we should be willing to be "not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles." In this glass our utmost diligence and services appear too minute to be noticed, and our difficulties and trials can scarcely be perceived: the prospect may well shame us out of all our boastings and complaints; and lead us to inquire, whether we be really engaged in the spiritual warfare, or are only called the soldiers of Christ. Here we may study patience, fortitude, meekness, and perseverance in well-doing; and confidence in God to protect, deliver, and comfort us, in every possible suffering or danger. Here we may learn to think less of our own ease, interest, indulgence, or reputation; and more of the great concerns of godliness; and to sympathize with the lighter sorrows of our brethren, even when more heavily afflicted ourselves. Here we may look, till poverty, reproach, hunger, thirst, watchings, fastings, cold, nakedness, stripes, and imprisonment, appear honourable; and even special privileges, when sustained in a good cause, and with a constant mind. Here we may learn to be content with food and raiment, thankful for mean and scanty provisions, indifferent about all worldly things, ardently desirous of doing good to others, and animated with the hope of success in this work, notwithstanding our manifold infirmities. These we should especially look at, if we are ever constrained to glory: we should ever keep in view our obligations to the Lord, from whom all our distinctions are received; we should strictly adhere to truth, as in his presence; and we should refer all to his glory, as "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for evermore."

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. The peculiarity of the apostle's circumstances rendered that conduct necessary, which otherwise would not have been "expedient," or conducive to general profit; and which it is probable, his opposers would censure, or even deride. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) He would, nevertheless, proceed to speak concerning "visions" of the divine glory, and "revelations" of heavenly things.—It may be supposed, that the false teachers at Corinth made high pretensions in these matters: and insinuated that Paul was not distinguished by them as the other apostles were.—In mentioning the extraordinary vision or revelation, here recorded, he modestly spoke in the third person; but there can be no doubt that he meant himself. He "knew a man in Christ," (Marg. Ref. e.) who fourteen years before had most extraordinary visions. Whether he was "in the body, or out of the body," at the time, God alone knew: but his outward senses were entirely closed, and his whole perception was immediately by the powers of his mind: but whether heavenly things were brought down to him, so to speak, as his body lay entranced; (as the case often seems to have been with the ancient prophets;) or whether his soul was dislodged from the body, for the time, and actually taken up into heaven; or whether he was taken up in body and soul together, he knew not. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Ez. 8:2—4. 11:22—25. Acts 8:36—40. Rev. 4:1—3.)—This language evidently proves, that the apostle most firmly believed the soul to be distinct from the body, and capable of perception, activity, and enjoyment, in a state of separation. (Notes, 1 Thes. 5:23—28, v. 23.)—However these things might be, this man was suddenly "caught up into the third," or the highest "heaven;" above the lower region of the air, and the starry heavens, to the place where the Lord immediately reveals his presence and glory, and receives the adoration of his heavenly hosts. Yea, this man, with whom he was so intimately acquainted, was "taken up into Paradise," the place of felicity, of which Eden was the type; and there heard such words as man could not speak if he might, and as it would be unlawful to speak if he could; it being the purpose of God, that the discoveries made of himself, in that glorious world, should not be more fully declared on earth than they had been.—Many approved commentators suppose these to have been two distinct visions; that Paradise is a different place from "the third heaven;" that in the latter, he saw Jesus at the right hand of the Father; and in the former he conversed with departed saints. But, as the happiness of the "spirits of just men made perfect," consists in being "present with the Lord," there seems to be no scriptural ground for this distinction. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 5:5—8. Luke 23: 39—43. Phil. 1:21—26.) The language is indeed varied, yet only one vision appears to be intended; but in that one through [r]the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me [s]a thorn in the flesh, [t]the messenger of Satan [u]to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure.

8 For this thing [x]I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me.

9 And he said unto me, [y]My grace is sufficient for thee: [z]for my strength is made perfect in weakness. [a]Most gladly therefore will I rather [b]glory in my infirmities, that [c]the power of Christ may rest upon me.

10 Therefore [d] I take pleasure [e]in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses [f]for Christ's sake: [g]for when I am weak, then am I strong. [Practical Observations.]

11 I am [h]become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: [i]for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, [k]though I be nothing.

12 Truly [l]the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that [m]I myself was not burdensome to you? [n]forgive me this wrong.

vision he doubtless had "abundance of revelations."—"Of this man," who was so highly favoured, at least equally with any of the ancient prophets, "he would glory;" though in himself, as to any thing which was properly his own, "he would not glory, except in his infirmities." In his present circumstances, indeed, he was excited to glory in these things, and to mention other visions, which had been made to him: yet he should not "act foolishly," as he could do it with perfect truth; which probably was not the case with the false teachers. He would, however, forbear speaking further on that subject, lest some of his friends should think more highly of him, than his manifest conduct and ministry authorized; and should thus be tempted to honour him too much, and perhaps to undervalue other faithful ministers in the comparison. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) Fourteen years had passed since the apostle had this most extraordinary vision; and he had not, as it appears, before mentioned it: he must therefore be allowed to have been exceedingly reluctant to glory in the honour conferred on him. The vision seems to have been vouchsafed to him, especially for his own support and encouragement amidst his various labours and sufferings: and, as no revelation of divine truth, needful to be known and believed by Christians, or ministers, was made to him; it was not only impossible, but even unlawful, if it could have been done, to relate what he had heard and seen.—As two distinct words are used, it is most natural to suppose, that they were intended to convey two distinct ideas.

V. 7—10. The apostle was not left to forget, that he was a feeble, sinful man, wholly dependent on mercy and grace, amidst all his honourable distinctions: his extraordinary and multiplied revelations were therefore soon followed by trials of a peculiarly distressing nature, lest they should prove an incentive to spiritual pride. What he saw in the third heavens must have been, in its own nature, of a humbling tendency: (Notes, Job 42:1—6. Is. 6:1—5.) yet when he came among his brethren, he would be apt to think, however otherwise abased, that none of them had seen or heard what he had seen and heard; or been favoured with such visions of God, as this in the third heaven. Thus the vision might have proved an occasion of self-preference, which would have induced a long train of evil consequences. But his gracious Lord, perceiving the danger, counteracted these effects, by "giving him a thorn in the flesh, &c." (Marg. Ref. q—s.) The expressions here employed, have occasioned commentators almost as much perplexity as the trial itself gave the apostle: but had it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, that our curiosity should be fully gratified in this respect, he would have led the writer to be more explicit; and the general statement is more suited for edification, than if the particular trial had been specified. (Notes, Gen. 32:25—31. P. O. 13—32.)—"A thorn," fixed and rankling in the flesh, would give great and constant pain; and some particular trials of the apostle, which began, or were augmented, after this remarkable vision, caused a continual uneasiness to his mind of a similar nature. Probably, these arose from the personal defects, of which he was conscious, which gave his enemies, especially the false apostles, a colour for reviling and deriding him. (Note, 11:13—15.) These things seemed to him likely to obstruct his usefulness, and they continually reminded him of his weakness and inability to do "any thing as of himself." Thus they were exceedingly uneasy and mortifying to him; and doubtless they afforded Satan "and his angels" an opportunity of tempting him to impatience, and discouraging him in his labours; as well as of exciting carnal men to insult and injure him.—Being thus constantly harassed and "buffeted," he thrice besought the Lord Jesus, that this "thorn in the flesh" might be removed from him; (as Jesus had thrice besought his Father, that "the cup might pass from him," Notes, Matt. 26:36—46.) and that "the messenger of Satan" might be compelled to depart: probably supposing, that otherwise he should not be able to proceed in his ministry with any encouraging prospect of success. This seems to prove, that he did not mean his persecutions, but those infirmities which emboldened his enemies and the false teachers. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, 10:7—11. Gal. 4:12—16.) The Lord, however, did not see good to grant his request: as he knew that this sharp trial was needful to keep him humble, and even to illustrate the power of his own grace. He was therefore pleased to continue his servant under it: but at the same time, he assured him, by immediate revelation, that his grace should certainly be communicated to him, in that measure which would be sufficient to support and comfort him under the affliction, and to enable him to fulfil his ministry notwithstanding: because his divine power had its most perfect work, and appeared most illustrious, by means of "the weakness" of those who were thus enabled to bear and perform such things, as in themselves they were, consciously and evidently, unfit for. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, 4:7. 1 Cor. 1:20—25. 2:1—5.) Thus the apostle's mind had been composed: nay, with heart-felt joy he "gloried in his infirmities;" in order that it might the more undeniably appear, that "the power of Christ" overshadowed, surrounded, and "rested upon him;" seeing he was evidently made very successful, in his extensive and important work; though he seemed to be disqualified for it, and also placed in such circumstances as to render it impossible he should proceed. Christ's omnipotence was glorified through Paul's weakness; and this made him "well pleased" with his infirmities, the reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses, to which he was exposed for his sake. He even counted them sources of pleasure and enjoyment; (Note, Rom. 5:3—5.) especially as he found that, in proportion as he was weak, in his own estimation, and that of other men; he was led more entirely to depend on Christ for strength, and so was actually made strong to bear all the sufferings, to resist all the temptations, and to perform all the services to which he was called.—This passage contains a most express example of prayer to Christ, and of confiding and glorying in him, as the Source of grace and power. (Marg. Ref. a—g. Notes, Ps. 146:3. Jer. 17:5—8.)—Had "the thorn in the flesh," consisted of disorders brought on the apostle, by the effect of the visions on his animal frame, he must have "known that he was in the body." (Note, 1—6.)—He could hardly have rejoiced in the continuance of those gross temptations, of which many of the fathers groundlessly suppose him to speak. (Note, 1 Cor. 7:6—9, v. 7.)—The "messenger also of Satan," is so involved with "the thorn in the flesh," in the narration, in the prayer, and in our Lord's answer; that it must mean, either the source whence his infirmities arose, (Note, Job 2:6—8.) or the inward temptations which accompanied them.

V. 11—13. Every topic unavoidably led the apostle to speak of the Lord's special favour towards him, even in his most humiliating trials. But if the Corinthians thought that he was "become a fool in glorying," it followed, that they "had compelled him:" for they ought strenuously to have stood up in defence of his character and ministry, when attacked by false teachers, as he was in no respect inferior to the greatest apostles; (11:5.) though he was "nothing" in himself, or compared with his Lord: his credit was of no consequence, apart from the glory of Christ; he was greatly disesteemed; and he was willing to be still more abased, that Christ might be the more glorified. Yet, in fact, all the signs and miracles, which distinguished the other apostles, had been wrought among the Corinthians, connected with great patience and perseverance, amidst difficulties and persecutions; especially in conferring on them also miraculous powers: nor was there any thing, in which they were less favoured than other churches; except that he had never burdened them by requiring a maintenance. If any of them would censure him, and complain of this, as "a wrong" done them; he must crave forgiveness of this his single offence, though he had fallen into it from a regard to their good.

V. 14, 15. The apostle had once been at Corinth; and he had repeatedly purposed to come again, and declared that purpose, but he had been disappointed. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, 1:15,16. 13:1—4. 1 Cor. 16:5—9.) However, the third time he fully expected that he should visit them: and he had resolved to put them to no expense on his account when he came; as he sought not to share their property, but to win and save their souls. For children were not expected to lay up money, as a future supply for their parents, but the parents for their children: and thus he had determined to do whatever he could to enrich the Corinthians with spiritual blessings, as their father in Christ, without accepting of any other return than their grateful affection. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Note, 1 Cor. 4:14—17.) Nay, he was even willing "to spend" his time, talents, health, and strength, among them: yea, "to be spent," and worn out, in his labours for the good of their souls; (Notes, 1 Thes. 2:9—12. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) even though the more abundantly and fervently he loved them, the less they loved him, and the more neglect and contempt they expressed towards him. (Marg. Ref. r, s.)—A more excellent frame of mind can scarcely be conceived, than that which is described in these emphatical words. (Note, Rom. 12:17—21.)

V. 16. Many preachers and writers without hesitation quote this verse, as the words of the apostle, giving an account of his own management: and it is to be feared, that it is often used to excuse or commend duplicity, in a variety of ways, by which men allow themselves to impose on others by false appearances and pretexts; in order to promote what they think the cause of truth and of God. (Note, Rom. 3:5—8.) But nothing can be more foreign to the true meaning of the passage, as it stands in the context: for it is undeniably the objection which the apostle supposed his opposers at Corinth would make to the account which he had given of his own disinterested conduct. In this indeed commentators of every kind are almost unanimous.—The false teachers would be ready to answer, that, though the apostle did not openly "burden" the people; yet, being an artful man, he craftily drew them in, by various pretences; and so obtained larger sums of them in an under hand manner, than would have sufficed for his maintenance. V. 17—21. To this objection the apostle replied, by inquiring, whether they could mention any man whom he had sent among them, by whom he had made a gain of them? (Note, 8:16—24.) Had not Titus, and others, acted in the same disinterested manner that he had done? And would some still pretend, that they only "made an apology" for themselves from sinister views? To this he would answer that he spake before God, as revealing himself in Christ; (Note, 1:23,24.) and that he did all things in subserviency to their edification, who were dearly beloved by him, notwithstanding all their unkindness. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) For he greatly feared, lest when he visited them, after the delays which he had purposely made, he should still find the church far from that pure state which he desired; and that they would not find him so gentle among them, as they would have him to be: (Note, 13:1—4.) but that he should meet with violent contentions, bitter envyings, mutual wrath and strife, and reciprocal slanders, suspicions, and surmises; while some would swell with pride, ambition, and disdain, or attempt to excite tumults against him, or those in the church who were not of their party. (Marg. Ref. b—k. Notes, Rom. 1:28—32. Gal. 5:19—21. 2 Tim. 3:1—5.) So that he feared lest his visit to Corinth, like "the thorn in his flesh," would be a trial to him, and a cause of humiliation and dejection, rather than of comfort: and that he should be constrained to bewail the case of many, who had grievously sinned, and had not repented of their enormities. These last verses show, to what dreadful excesses the self-sufficient teachers had drawn aside their deluded followers: and that the incestuous person, who had been brought to repentance, was only one of a considerable number, who had committed crimes of a similar nature; and who persisted so obstinately in them, that there was a danger lest they should unite against the apostle's authority; and so constrain him to use great severity. (Marg. Ref. l—p.) This surely gives us the idea of Gentiles, who professed Christianity, and corrupted it with heathen speculations and licentiousness, rather than of those who attempted to impose the law of Moses on the Gentile converts.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. When we cannot avoid speaking such things concerning ourselves, as seem to imply boasting; we should use every method of rendering our conduct in so doing consistent with modesty and humility.—Those things which are seen and heard, "in the heaven of heavens," are so far above our present conceptions, that the most eminent believers could not sustain the view of them: except they were cast into such an ecstasy, as not to know whether they were "in the body or out of the body:" nor can human language make the result of such visions intelligible to mortal ears. While this should teach us to enlarge our expectations of the "glory that shall be revealed;" it should also render us contented with our more ordinary method of learning the truth and will of God.—For the heart, even of the best of men, has in it the remains of pride; and even "visions and revelations of the Lord" might occasion self-exaltation. (Notes and P. O. 2 Chr. 32:24—33.) When any thing of this kind takes place in those whom he loves, some "thorn in the flesh" will be surely "given them," and a "messenger of Satan" let loose to "buffet them:" on the contrary, the delusions of enthusiasts tend only to pride, without any counterpoise. It is however very surprising, that the relics of corrupt nature should as it were learn pride in heaven, and that grace should be taught humility, even by Satan and his messengers.—However painful the process may be, the wise Christian will be thankful to be kept from being "exalted above measure:" and e will be more ready

CHAPTER XIII.

The apostle declares his expectation and purpose of inflicting miraculous punishments on those who persisted in opposing his authority, 1—4. He exhorts the people to self-examination, 5; and to disarm him of his power to use sharpness, by their previous repentance, 6—10. He concludes with exhortations, salutations, and benedictions, 11—14.

THIS is [a]the third time I am coming to you! [b]In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established.

2 I [c]told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present, the second time; and [d]being absent now I write to them which [e]heretofore have sinned and to all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare:

3 Since [f]ye seek a proof of [g]Christ speaking in me, [h]which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you.

4 For though [i]he was crucified through weakness, [k]yet he liveth by the power of God. For [l]we also are weak [m]in him, [m]but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you.

to speak of his sins and foibles, than of his extraordinary discoveries and consolations; for he will not desire, that "any one should think of him above what he seeth him to be."—Whatever there is in any man's experience, whether of outward trials, or of inward conflicts and temptations, which serves to counterbalance more encouraging circumstances and events, and mortify pride: he may very properly consider it as a "thorn in the flesh," given to him to prevent far worse consequences. And it is especially matter of gratitude, when this prevention is effected; without his being left to commit actual sin, or to dishonour the gospel.—Whenwe are "buffeted" by Satan or his agents, we should apply without delay, and with all earnestness, to our "merciful and faithful High-Priest;" who "suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour those that are tempted:" (Notes, Heb. 2:16—18. 4:14—16.) and we should be frequent, as well as instant, in beseeching him, that those temptations and trials may depart, which appear to impede our usefulness, or to endanger the credit of our profession. Yet we must not conclude that our prayers are rejected, when the desired deliverance is delayed; as he may see those conflicts salutary, which we deem ruinous. His wisdom must be trusted, as well as his truth and love: and when we strive against sin, bear up under discouragements, and attend to our duty, in dependence on him; we may rest satisfied "that his grace will be sufficient for us, and that his strength will be made perfect in our weakness." (Notes, Ps. 138:3. Is. 40:27—31. Eph. 3:14—19. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13. Col. 1:9—14, vv. 11,12.) He frequently answers prayer by reconciling our minds to humiliating trials, and by increasing our strength for that conflict which we were desirous of declining: and sometimes Christians have such views of his glory, and such confidence in his grace, that they can "most gladly glory in their infirmities," assured that "his power will rest upon them," and be honoured in and by them. Thus a man may even "take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses, for Christ's sake:" and though we have not by far arrived at this vigour of faith and love; yet if we are indeed believers, we have also found, that when we most felt our own weakness, we were peculiarly "strong in the Lord:" and when we began to think ourselves strong, we have been left to discover, and perhaps to expose, our own weakness. Nor let it be forgotten, that whatever religious instruction or principle leads men to think that they have any strength in themselves, proportionably renders them weak, in the hour of temptation: while the humbling consciousness, that there is no health, or help, or strength in us, as connected with a constant reliance on the all-sufficient grace of Christ, and fervent prayer for his effectual assistance, conduces proportionably to make us "strong in the grace of our Lord," for service, suffering, conflict, and triumphant victory.

V. 11—21. They, who do not give proper commendation to such as have faithfully laboured for their good, but prefer every new voice to that of their own pastors, often compel them to glory, and then perhaps censure them for it. But, whatever the Lord may give us, or do by us, "we are nothing" in ourselves, but sin and folly: so that the deepest self-abasement and self-renunciation, not only consist with the consciousness of the Lord's special goodness towards us, but are intimately connected with it.—It is a great thing for ministers to be warranted in saying before God and to the people, "we seek not yours but you;" not your property, but your souls. Alas! in what numerous or rather numberless instances must the words be transposed, in order to be true; as the preachers seek one, the property, and not the salvation, of their hearers! But the more disinterested our labours are, the more apostolical they must be allowed to be: and it is generally desirable to avoid being burdensome to our congregations; for far more will "forgive us this wrong," than the very appearance of being mercenary. Indeed we should, as far as we can, imitate the conduct of affectionate parents, who seek to enrich their children, and not to be enriched by them.—But how very difficult is it, "most gladly to spend and be spent" for those, who make unkind returns; and who seem to love those least who most love them! We are, alas, soon vanquished in contests of this kind; and may hence infer how far short we are of the apostle's measure of grace, who yet long after this confessed that "he had not already attained;" (Note, Phil. 3:12—14.) and thus we may be excited to pray for an increase of faith, love, and patience.—No excellency of spirit or conduct can silence calumny: and if we were even as holy as Paul, some would revile us as "crafty men, who took others by guile." It is well when we can disprove such slanders, and when fellow-labourers "walk in the same spirit and steps." We should not, however, be too anxious to defend ourselves, and plead our own cause, being satisfied with a clear conscience towards God: yet we ought to "do all things for the edification" of our brethren, and the recovery of such as have been drawn aside.—But how can faithful ministers be expected to prove such as their people desire: when they witness among them those contentions, envies, slanders, whisperings, boastings, and tumults, which not only grieve and humble them, but also disgrace the gospel? (Note, 1 Kings 22:8. P. O. 1—9.) Alas! they are often cast down, and sent to "bewail" the crimes of those whom they fondly hoped would be a comfort to them; and they are frequently distressed on account of their own mistakes or infirmities, which they fear have tended to prevent their usefulness. But how grievous is it, that such evils should prevail among the professors of the gospel; and that we should still have to lament over many who have grievously "sinned, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness, which they have committed!" Yet we need not despond on this account; for it was so even in the apostle's days. But while we observe that "the enemy hath done this:" we should not forget to add, that it was by means of antinomian and self-conceited teachers; and perhaps through our own unwatchfulness, or carnal and undecided conduct.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1—4. (Note, 12:14,15.) As the law of God by Moses had prescribed, that no accused person should be condemned, unless two or three witnesses testified against him: so the repeated warnings given by the apostle, of his purpose to come and inflict punishment on the impenitent offenders at Corinth, would, as it were, testify against them, and make way for those judgments. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, Num. 35:24—30. Deut. 17:2—7. 19:15—21.) Or rather, when at length he should come, he would proceed against them according to that law, or to the rule laid down by Christ for his disciples. (Notes, Matt. 18:15—18.)—In the former epistle he had before told them of his purpose: in the preceding part of this epistle he had again warned them as if present with them: and here again, at the conclusion, being yet "absent," and giving them a little longer space to repent, he now wrote, to assure those who had before sinned and continued untractable, and all others who might countenance them, that "when he came again, he would not spare" the offenders, nor appear so timid and weak as they before had concluded him to be: (Notes, 10,1—11. 12:17—21. 1 Cor. 4:18—21. 5:1—5.) especially as some of them boldly demanded "proof" of Christ's speaking "in him" as his apostle; though this had already been confirmed by no feeble evidence, but by his mighty power working in and among them, in various ways. 'Christ showed his power among them, by enabling St. Paul to preach the gospel to them, "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," so efficaciously, as to convert them to the faith; (1 Cor. 2:4.) in that variety of gifts conferred on them, together with the gospel, by which "the testimony of Christ was confirmed:" (1 Cor. 1:6.) by his power, conspicuous in seconding St. Paul's delivery of the incestuous Corinthian up to Satan: (1 Cor. 5:4,5.) . . . and by the chastisements they suffered for communicating in the Lord's supper unworthily.' Whithy. (Notes, 2:5—11. 1 Cor. 11:29—34)—For though Jesus was crucified, as if he had been only a weak, helpless man; and was despised as unable "to save himself;" yet he was raised from the dead, and lived in glory, "by the power of God," to "put all enemies under his feet." In like manner, the apostle and his brethren appeared weak and despicable, as being made like the Saviour; and the power, which they spake of, seemed to be dead, because they did not exercise it: yet they were assured that it would revive, and that they should be evidently quickened, and endued with the power of God, exerted in their behalf towards the disobedient Corinthians, by inflicting miraculous judgments upon them. (Note, 4:8—12.)—The language here used to the refractory Corinthians contains the strongest proof imaginable, that the apostle was conscious that he spake and acted by a divine authority; and that he feared no detection, and was certain that his Lord would put all his opposers to confusion.—In the mouth, &c. 5 [n]Examine you selves, whether ye be [o]in the faith; prove your ownselves. [p]Know ye not your own selves, how that [q]Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be [r]reprobates?

6 But [s]I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates.

[Practical Observations.]

7 Now [t]I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear [u]approved, but that ye should do that which is [x]honest, though we be [y]as reprobates.

8 For [z]we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.

9 For we are glad, [a]when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, [b]even your perfection.

10 Therefore [c]I write these things, being absent, [d]lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

11 Finally, brethren, [e]farewell. [f]Be perfect, [g]be of good comfort, [h]be of one mind, [i]live in peace; and [k]the God of love and peace shall be [l]with you.

12 Greet [m]one another with a holy kiss.

13 [n]All the saints salute you.

14 [o]The [p]grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, [q]and the love of God, [r]and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. [s]Amen.

V. 5, 6. Instead of presumptuously judging the apostle, and demanding his credentials; it behooved the persons concerned, and indeed all the Christians at Corinth, to "examine themselves, whether they" really "were in the faith;" and whether they had any thing more than a formal profession and a dead faith. Let them then prove their tempers, conduct, and experience, by the standard of God's word, as gold is assayed or tried by the touchstone; for he feared that many of them were self-deceived in this important concern. After all their boasting of knowledge, would they continue ignorant of themselves, of their own state, character, and hearts? or that "Jesus Christ was in them," by the in-dwelling of his Spirit, by his image renewed on their souls, by his kingdom set up in their hearts, and by possessing their supreme love and affection; unless they were to that day merely nominal Christians, who would at last be disapproved and rejected, as the dross is by the refiner? (Marg. Ref. n—r.)—Some expositors render the clause, "Christ is among you, except, &c." but this conveys no definite idea. The apostle could not mean to intimate, that Christ was not at all present in the church at Corinth; for this would have contradicted all the declarations which he made concerning them: and the presence of Christ, among them, could not prove that those individuals whom he warned were true believers, and approved by God: yet this was the precise point which he exhorted them personally to examine.—In determining this question, they would also decide another, as far as they were individually concerned: seeing that those, who could clearly ascertain, that "Christ dwelt in their hearts by faith," must consider themselves as living demonstrations that Paul was a true apostle; for "the seal of his apostleship were they in the Lord:" (Notes, 3:1—3. 1 Cor. 9:1—3.) and they could not disprove his claim, without acknowledging themselves to be without proof of their own conversion. He trusted, therefore, that in this way many knew that Christ had approved and owned his ministry: and all the rest would soon know it in another manner.—Reprobates. (6) 'Thus the apostle calls in this place, not those who are not divinely elected to eternal life; (for they who still continue in their sins, not being yet effectually called, are not directly to be considered as "vessels of wrath;" nor those who, after their calling, fall into grievous sins;) but such as are not at present approved.' Beza.—It does not appear that either the original word, or our English word "reprobates," is ever in Scripture used as the opposite to "elect," or indeed with direct reference to election; and as to reprobation, it is, I apprehend, a scriptural idea, (for those who are not "chosen," must be rejected, or passed by,) but not a scriptural word in any sense. (Notes, 10:17,18. Jer. 6:27—30. 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)

V. 7—10. The apostle prayed for his brethren at Corinth, that they might "do no evil," but repent of what they had done: not that he and his friends should appear "approved," by the submission of all parties to his authority; but that they might do what was right and becoming them, though it should occasion him to be disapproved and censured; or even thought destitute of apostolical authority, because he had no occasion given him of exercising it by inflicting judgments. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) For indeed he and his brethren "could do nothing" in this way "against the truth" of the gospel being vested with miraculous powers, only that they might defend the truth: and should they attempt to work a miracle, in their own spirit, to advance their own credit, or to punish their opponents, contrary to the will of God, and the interests of true religion; God would not exert his power to sanction their wrong spirit and conduct; and so their attempt would be in vain. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, 1 Kings 17:1. 2 Kings 1:10. 2:23,24. Prov. 26:2. Luke 9:51—56.) But indeed the apostle loved their souls far more than his own reputation: and therefore he should be "glad to be weak," in this respect, by their strength of faith and grace removing all occasion of displaying his power: and indeed the great desire of his heart was their perfect re-establishment in the faith and holiness of the gospel; as a man is perfectly recovered from a dangerous malady, or from the breaking or dislocation of his bones. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Therefore he wrote these things before he came to Corinth, that they might have time for this complete recovery: lest, contrary to his inclination, he should be compelled to use severity, according to his apostolical power which the Lord had intrusted to him; that, in the use of it he might promote the edification of believers, and bring sinners to repentance, and so prevent their final destruction. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, 10:7—11.)

V. 11—14. The apostle at length closed this most instructive epistle, with his friendly salutations, and affectionate desires and prayers for the present and future welfare of the Christians at Corinth: exhorting them to be sincere, entire, established in the faith, and unreservedly the disciples of Christ; exciting them to be "joyful in the Lord," and "of good comfort" amidst all temptations; and also to exhort and animate one another; calling on them to lay aside contentions, that they might all be of "one heart and judgment;" delighting in and attending to the same things, and "living in peace:" (Marg. Ref. e—i. Notes, Rom. 12:14—16. 1 Cor. 1:10—16. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4.) and assuring them that in this way, "the God of love and peace," the Source and Pattern of love and peace, would manifest his presence among them and bless them. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Note, Phil. 4:8,9.) As a token of their mutual forgiveness and love, let them salute each other with a holy kiss. (Marg. Ref. m.) He assured them, that "all the saints," residing where he then was, desired affectionately to salute them. And finally he prayed that the free favour, mercy, and salvation of the Lord Jesus Christ; all which comes to believers, through his mediation, his righteousness, atonement, and intercession; with the love of God the Father to them, as the objects of his choice, and his adopted children, and as rendering them joyful in loving God with all their heart; and the participation of all the gifts, graces, and consolations of the Holy Ghost, might be with them all. That so, all blessings from the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in whose One name they had been baptized, might be conferred on all of them, and constantly enjoyed by all of them, without exception; to the glory of the three Persons in the sacred Trinity, according to the parts and offices which they sustain, in the great work of man's redemption. (Notes, Num. 6:24—27. Matt. 28:19,20.) This most comprehensive benediction has generally been adopted in the worship of Christians, when about to separate; but alas, it is too evident, that most in our congregations, not to say of the officiating ministers, regard it as a mere form.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. All rigorous measures should be preceded by long patience and many warnings, when the case will admit of them; and with caution and deliberation, upon sure grounds, and with firmness of mind.—Those who will not be convinced by the abundant evidences already afforded, that Christ speaks by his faithful ministers, will at length experience a very awful demonstration of it. These cannot appear more weak and despicable in the eyes of carnal men, than Jesus did to the chief priests, rulers, and people when he hung upon the cross: (Note, Matt. 27:39—44.) yet he now lives, and has "all power in heaven and earth:" and when he shall come to judgment, every denunciation of vengeance uttered by his servants, according to his word, will be found to be "living" and powerful for the condemnation of despisers. We should therefore, diligently and impartially, "examine ourselves whether we are in the faith;" (Note, 1 Cor. 11:23—28.) and, instead of imagining, that it is always unbelief to doubt of our acceptance; we should daily bring the whole of our faith, experience, motives, comforts, affections, words, and works, to be assayed by the touchstone of the Scriptures; that we may get well acquainted with ourselves; obtain an assurance that will not shrink from investigation; and possess that "hope, which maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." (Note, Rom. 5:3—5.) For except "Jesus Christ be in us," by his Spirit, his image, and the governing power of his love, our faith is dead, and we are as yet disapproved by our Judge. While ministers give these warnings, they should also look well to themselves. For nothing can be imagined equally dreadful with the case of those who have instructed, warned, reproved, and expostulated with others on these infinitely important subjects; and have been eventually successful in their endeavours: if they themselves should be found reprobates, and be finally rejected as hypocrites. Then all their own public instructions and private exhortations addressed to others, and their social prayers, nay the letters and books which they have written, shall rise up in judgment against themselves; and it shall be said to them, "Out of thy own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant." May God preserve all of us from this awful doom!—In general, however, those who are most presumptuous in judging others, have most reason to look diligently, and even with suspicion, to themselves.

V. 7—14. We should earnestly pray to God in behalf of those whom we caution or reprove, that they may "cease to do evil, and learn to do well;" though their good conduct, "as it becometh the gospel of Christ," should expose us to censure for our doubts concerning them. For it is our duty to rejoice, when others are "strong in the grace of Christ," though that should be the means of exposing our own weakness; and to long for the perfection of knowledge, holiness, and comfort, in behalf of those who have imbibed a strong dislike to us; even if this should proportionally confirm and increase men's prejudices against ourselves. In short, all our interests and feelings, except our present holiness, and our future felicity, should be considered as comparatively a small matter, when they come in competition with the honour of Christ, and the prosperity of his church.—The miraculous powers of the apostles could not be used "against the truth," but only in its defence: yet abilities, gifts, authority, and influence, as well as the censures and excommunications of the church, with every power to persecute those branded as heretics, may be employed against the cause of Christ, and the edification of his people; yea, to the destruction of the possessors, and of numbers along with them: we should then pray for grace to preserve us from doing mischief, and to enable us and all concerned, to make a proper improvement of our several talents.—If we would have "the God of love and peace to be with us," for our spiritual advantage and consolation; we should use diligently every means of becoming "steadfast in the faith of Christ," and endeavour to act consistently with it; to be united in heart and soul with all our brethren, and to follow peace with all men. Then we may hope that "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, will be with us all:" that, through us, glory may be 'to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, Amen.' And what more can we desire for ourselves, or our brethren, than this frequently repeated apostolical benediction implies? May we then, at all times, when these words are on our lips, or spoken in our hearing, so enter into the meaning of them, with fervent affections, and enlarged desires and expectations: that the blessings prayed for by them may be upon us and all our fellow-worshippers, now and for evermore! Amen

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

The Galatians, or Gallogrecians, were the descendants of Gauls, who migrated from their own country, to seek for new settlements; and who, after a variety of disasters, got possession of a considerable district in Asia Minor, near to Lycaonia, Lystra, and Iconium. (Notes, Acts 16:6—12. 18:18—23.) It is supposed, that they retained their native language and customs, at the time when the gospel was first preached among them. Learned men have shown it to be probable, that this was during the first progress of Paul and Barnabas through those regions: (Acts 14:) for though Galatia is not mentioned, yet "the regions round about Lycaonia," may be supposed to include Galatia. But some attempts to fix the date of their conversion to an earlier period, are wholly destitute of scriptural proof, and unsupported by any solid argument.—It is plain, that the Galatians were generally idolatrous Gentiles, before their conversion. The apostle was not able to spend much time among them, because of his multiplied engagements: yet he asserts, in a way which challenges refutation, that he conferred miraculous gifts on them. (Note, 3:1—5.) But soon after he left them, some professed converts to Christianity, who were zealous for the Mosaic law, intruded among them; drawing them off from the true gospel, to depend on ceremonial observances, and to the vain endeavour of "establishing their own righteousness." The way in which the apostle, with the greatest decision, and apparent severity, opposes this false gospel, will appear as we proceed: but certainly it shows that he considered the very life and soul of Christianity to be at a stake. Yet his opposition to this self righteous perversion of Christianity does not, in the smallest degree, lead him to overlook its holy and practical tendency: and, in this respect, the epistle before us forms a striking contrast to the over-zealous and vehement earnestness of numbers, for a part of Christianity; while another part of equal importance is overlooked, if not disparaged.—Learned men maintain different opinions, as to the time when this epistle was written. Most, however, agree, that the apocryphal postscript, which dates it from Rome, contains a direct untruth. It is probable, that it was written during the apostle's residence at Corinth: though some fix the date of it to the time during which the apostle abode at Antioch, after his first progress through Asia Minor with Barnabas, and after the council at Jerusalem: but before he set off the second time, with Silas and Timothy, when the decrees were delivered to the churches. (Notes, Acts 15:30—41. 16:1—5.) The former opinion is, however, more generally maintained: indeed, it is not certain that the apostle had been in Galatia, before his second progress through Asia Minor: (Note, Acts 16:6—12.) and the objection to the epistle's being written at a later period, arising from the decrees which had been sent by the apostles to the churches, which might, it is thought, have superseded the necessity of it, seems of little weight. The apostles had indeed decided against the ceremonial law being imposed on the Gentile converts, but they had not shown that the Gentiles, by voluntarily submitting to it, went about to "establish their own righteousness," and virtually renounced the gospel.—Ancyra, Pessinus, Tavium, and Germa, are mentioned by geographers, as cities of Galatia; nay, Iconium is by some numbered among them: and St. Paul is supposed to have founded churches in these and other cities in that district

CHAPTER I.

Paul asserts his divine appointment to the apostolical office, 1. He salutes the churches of Galatia, and praises God, 2—5. He sharply reproves the Galatians for so soon turning aside to a false gospel; and denounces an awful curse on all who preached any other doctrine, than that which they had received from him, 6—10. He declares that he had his authority and instructions from Christ; and shows what his conduct had been before his conversion, and what it was afterwards, 11—24.

PAUL, [a]an apostle, ([b]not of men, [c]neither by man, [d]but by Jesus Christ, [e]and God the Father, who [f]raised him from the dead;)

2 And [g]all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia:

3 [i]Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ,

4 Who [k]gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us [l]from this present evil world, [m]according to the will of God and [n]our Father:

5 To [o]whom be glory for ever and ever. [p]Amen. [Practical Observations.]

6 I [q]marvel that ye are [r]so soon removed from him [s]that called you into [t]the grace of Christ, [u]unto another gospel:

7 Which is not another; [x]but there be some that trouble you, and would [y]pervert the gospel of Christ.

8 But [z]though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, [a]let him be [b]accursed.

9 As we said before, [c]so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you [d]than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

10 For [e]do I now [f]persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? [g]for if I yet pleased men, I should not be [h]the servant of Christ. [Practical Observations.]

11 But I certify you, brethren, [i]that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man:

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Note, Acts 13:1—3.) It is highly probable, that the Judaizing teachers in Galatia expressly denied Paul to be an apostle; or at least maintained that he was not equal to Peter and the other apostles. (Notes, 2:1—16.) He therefore began his epistle by calling himself an apostle, and declaring that he was not sent forth by human authority, nor yet by the intervention of any man, as even Matthias had been; (Note, Acts 1:15—26.) "but by Jesus Christ, and by God the Father who raised him from the dead." As Christ received his mediatorial kingdom from the Father: so Paul received his apostleship from Christ, and from "God the Father" by him: and, though he was not appointed to that office before the death of Jesus, as most of the other apostles were; yet his authority was equally valid, being personally conferred on him by his "risen" Lord and Saviour. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Acts 9:15,16. 22:14—21. 26:16—18.) Ananias baptized Paul: but he neither appointed him to the apostleship, nor instructed him for it.—With him, all the brethren (probably the ministers were intended) who were then with the apostle, joined in this epistle; as testifying the facts, and concurring in the doctrines, contained in it.—'Perhaps the apostle meant to distinguish himself from those who were constituted by the apostles ... and sent by them to different places; being peculiarly named evangelists. Of this kind were Timothy, Titus, Luke, and other companions of Paul, who were celebrated in his epistles, and the Acts of the Apostles.' Beza.—The epistle was addressed to "the churches of Galatia," or the several congregations of professed Christians, which had been collected in that province: but he did not call them "saints;" perhaps because, as they had departed from the faith in the fundamental article of justification, "he stood in doubt of them." (Marg. Ref. h. Note, 4:17—20.)

V. 3—5. (Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:3.) After the usual salutation, the apostle added, that Jesus "gave himself" a willing and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of men, "that he might deliver" all who believed in him, from the condemnation, pollution, maxims, fashions, and conduct of "this present evil world," according "to the will" and appointment "of God our Father;" to whom the whole glory ought to be, and would be, referred for ever, and to whom he thus ascribed it. (Marg. Ref. i—p.) This deliverance could not be effected, consistently with the glory of God; except by the redemption of Christ, and the acceptance, reconciliation, and grace, which are through him: if then the Galatians renounced their dependence on Christ, they must continue enslaved to "this present evil world," and be condemned with it: for no outward forms, or observances, could deliver them from it, or give them the victory over it. (Notes, 1 John 5:4,5,19—21.)—Some indeed interpret the words, which we render "this present evil world," of the Mosaic dispensation; which was then become a mere carnal system, connected with the love and spirit of the world, the fear of men, bondage to sin, and exposedness to condemnation. (Note, 4:21—31.) But the preceding explanation is far more extensive and natural: most of the Galatians were Gentiles before their conversion; and even the ritual law of Moses is never called "evil" in Scripture, much less the whole Mosaic dispensation: so that the interpretation is wholly inadmissible.

From this present evil world. (4) Εκ του ενεστωτος αιωνος πονηρου. Ενεστως, Rom. 8:38.—Αιων, 4:4. Matt. 13:22. Luke 16:8 Rom. 12:2. 1 Cor. 2:6. Eph. 2:2. 6:12. 2 Tim. 4:10. Tit. 2:12. Πονηρος, Matt. 6:13. 13:19,38,49. 1 John 5:18,19.

V. 6—10. It is remarkable, in how different a manner the apostle addressed the Galatians, than he did the Corinthians. It has been shown, that he used the utmost caution, and the most delicate and consummate management, in undermining the influence, and counteracting the delusions, of the false teachers at Corinth: (Preface, 1 Cor.) but he at once and abruptly attacked the error of the Galatians, in a direct and open manner, without any circumlocution. The Corinthians had indeed "built wood, hay, stubble" upon "the good Foundation;" but the Galatians were attempting to lay a wrong foundation. The former "might be saved as by fire," notwithstanding errors and abuses; but the latter must perish, unless recovered from their infatuation. (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) In the former case, the errors had been introduced more plausibly, and had diffused their baleful influence more gradually: the tares were so mingled with the wheat, that they could not be plucked up by a rough hand, without the greatest danger; and much caution was requisite, lest Satan should get still further advantages. (Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 2 Cor. 2:5—11.) But in Galatia, the error was simple and fundamental; it was a virtual renunciation of the gospel, and destructive in its very nature. The persons who propagated "another gospel" in Galatia, were as determined enemies to true Christianity, as "the false apostles" at Corinth, and more evidently so; but they were not equal to them in ingenuity. (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) The detection of their error also, lay within a small compass, their example was of a most dangerous tendency, their progress was likely to be very rapid unless effectually checked; and therefore the apostle opened his subject, in the language of astonishment at the conduct of the Galatians. He had been employed to "call them," by his ministry "into the grace of Christ:" or a professed dependence for acceptance on the free mercy of God, through the righteousness and atoning sacrifice of Christ, and by faith in him. He had fully instructed them in these important subjects, and confirmed his instructions by miracles, and the gifts of the Spirit conferred on them: and they had appeared cordially to embrace this salvation: he could not therefore but be exceedingly surprised, as well as grieved, that they should so soon be induced to disclaim his ministry, and renounce his doctrine, by turning to "another gospel." (Marg. Ref. r—u.) It was more evident at first sight, that the Galatians had been removed from the ministry and doctrine of Paul, than it was that they had renounced Christianity: and he stood in doubt whether they had been really "called into the grace of Christ:" it is therefore more obvious to understand him, as speaking of the instrument of their outward calling, than of the Agent in effectual vocation.—Indeed the new doctrine, introduced in Galatia, was not "another gospel," nor any gospel at all; but a most fatal delusion, shutting up under condemnation all those who adhered to it. (Note, 5:1—6.) This the apostle hoped would not be their case; as the immediate blame was to be cast on certain persons, whose aim was to trouble, perplex, and mislead the minds of the Gentile converts; and to "pervert the gospel of Christ," out of a blind, bigoted, and proud zeal for the Mosaic dispensation. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) They, no doubt, appeared to the unstable and unwary Galatians to speak very plausibly, concerning obedience to the law as joined with faith in Christ, in order to justification: but he must in the strongest and plainest terms declare, that whoever preached them any gospel contrary to that which he had preached to them and they had received, or even added any thing to it on the grand question of justification, would be, and ought to be, "accursed;" as one that remained under the curse of the law, and kept others under it; and as acting in direct opposition to Christ, and the glory of God in his salvation. (Note, 3:10—14.) This would be, yea, "let it be," the case, even if Paul himself, or one of his apostles, should depart from their former doctrine, and endeavour to establish any other foundation for a sinner's hope, than that which they had laid. Indeed, were it possible for an angel to come from heaven, and to preach a doctrine contrary to the gratuitous justification of a sinner, by faith in the righteousness of Christ alone; he must at that moment become an apostate spirit, a rebel against God, an enemy to Christ, and "accursed" in himself. So that, abilities, morality, plausibility, or even miracles, were not to be regarded in this case. Nor let this be considered as the language of intemperate zeal: for he would repeat it with the greatest solemnity, and again denounce "accursed," by his apostolical authority, every one who thus attempted to lay any false foundation; that they might learn to dread and abhor those delusions which they had unwarily encouraged. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) For could they suppose, that after so many years of labour and suffering in the cause of Christ, he only meant to persuade men to adopt his own private sentiments, that he might ingratiate himself with them; instead of pleading the cause of God, and approving himself to him? Indeed, if this had been his object, he should never have entered on the service of Christ, or so long continued in it: and if, in so fundamental a doctrine, he accommodated his discourse to the pride and prejudices of men's hearts; he could not act as "the servant of Christ," who cannot be pleased with those things, which suit the carnal minds and worldly wisdom of men.—The apostle "became all things to all men," that he might "please them for their edification;" and he even tolerated difference of sentiment and conduct, in various instances, respecting the Mosaic law: (Note, 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) we must therefore conclude, that this decisive language related only to that fundamental doctrine, of which he was about to treat; or to other doctrines of similar clearness and importance. It does not behoove us to use the same authoritative language, or to denounce anathemas on those who differ from us: yet we may properly show men, how evidently the apostle's words conclude those under the curse, who teach sinners to rely for justification, in the least measure or degree, on any thing except the free grace of God, through the righteousness and atonement of Christ. (Marg. Ref. e—h.)—Should not be, &c. V. 11—14. The reason of the awful denunciation, which the apostle had just made, was contained in the assurance which he possessed, that "his gospel was not after man;" neither of human invention, nor suited to the dispositions and opinions of mankind. For he "had not received it" from any human teaching, but it was immediately revealed to him by Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. i. Note, 1,2.) This might be illustrated by facts: for they had often heard of his character and conduct, in former years, when he professed the religion of the Jews; and how his extraordinary zeal had induced him to exceed the measure of all other opposers, in furiously persecuting the church; which "he wasted," as a wolf does the sheep; or as a victorious army plunders and destroys the city which it has taken. (Marg. Ref. k, l.

Notes, Acts 8:1,3. 9:1,2. 22:1—5. 26:9—11. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.) He had also been well instructed in the religion of the Jews, and had made greater proficiency in his studies, than most of those who were his equals in age, rank, and education; as well as far exceeded them in zeal for the traditions of the elders, along with the law of Moses. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Matt. 15:1—20.) It could not therefore be supposed, that he should at once, and contrary to all his interests and opening prospects of advancement, both embrace Christianity and preach it first to his countrymen, and soon after to the Gentiles, without regarding his former tenets and zealous attachments; unless some adequate cause had intervened to produce the extraordinary change.—'For, says he, it is well known in what school I was educated from my youth; namely, among the principal enemies of the gospel.... And also, that I even excelled in the religion of a Pharisee: and thus from being a Pharisee, I suddenly became the apostle of the Gentiles: so that no time intervened, in which I could be taught by man.' Beza.—'A revelation of the facts and doctrines of Christianity immediately from Christ himself, without the assistance of any human teacher, so wonderfully agreeing in all its branches with that which Christ had taught on earth, both before and after his resurrection, was so extraordinary an event, and of so great importance to those whom St. Paul visited, and to whom he wrote, that one cannot wonder he should think proper to assert it in so solemn a manner.' Doddridge.—The marked distinction between being "taught by man," and "by the revelation of Jesus Christ," is a clear proof of our Lord's Deity.—'In this respect, Paul seems to have been, in a measure, superior to the other apostles, whom Christ instructed on earth after the manner of men.' Beza.

V. 15—24. God had chosen Paul, even "from his mother's womb," to be an apostle, and had in his purpose "set him apart" for that service; and, according to this purpose and choice, he was pleased in due time, to call him by his grace unto the knowledge and faith of the gospel, and thus of his abundant mercy to "reconcile him unto himself by Jesus Christ." Thus, along with the outward extraordinary circumstances of his conversion, it had also pleased God to "reveal his Son," in the glory of his Person and salvation, to his mind and heart, and to display his power, love, and grace, in the conversion of this prejudiced and violent enemy, that he might make his name more widely known on earth, by sending him as an apostle to preach Christ to the Gentiles: (Marg. Ref. p—s. Notes, Acts 26:16—18. 2 Cor. 4:7.) when this gracious change had taken place, he immediately prepared for obedience, without consulting with men of any description; or conferring with the dictates o.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle shows for what purpose he, after many years, again went up to Jerusalem, 1, 2; and that Titus, who attended him, was not circumcised; lest the freedom of the Gentile converts from the law should be doubted, 3—5. No additional knowledge or authority was communicated to him by the other apostles; but they acknowledged his divine mission to the Gentiles, 6—10. At Antioch, he openly withstood Peter; who dissembled, as to communion with the Gentile converts, for fear of some from among the Jews, and induced others to dissemble, 11—13; expostulating with him, because he, who himself sought justification by "faith in Christ," led others to seek it by the works of the law, 14—16. The apostle, by the law was "become dead to the law, that he might live to God;" being "crucified with Christ, yet living, Christ living in him; and he living by faith in Christ, and not frustrating the grace of God," 17—21.

his own carnal mind or worldly wisdom, about the consequences of his conduct to his interest, credit, ease, or life itself. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) When he entered on this great work, he did not go up to Jerusalem to receive instructions, or to obtain a commission from those who had been apostles, before his extraordinary conversion and appointment to that service: but he proceeded to exercise his ministry without delay, and very soon went into Arabia, for that purpose. Afterwards he preached at Damascus, till he was driven thence by persecution. At length, "after three years," he went to Jerusalem to visit Peter, as a brother in Christ; to confer with him, and to relate the gracious dealings of God, and what he had wrought by him; but neither he nor James attempted to add any thing to the instructions or authority which he had received from the Lord: and for the entire truth of all that he had stated, he solemnly appealed to God. (Marg. Ref. y—b. Note, 2 Cor. 1:23,24.) After a short time he left Jerusalem: and the other churches in Judea did not so much as know him personally: but the account of this wonderful conversion excited them to adore the power and grace of God toward so terrible a persecutor; and to bless his name for so great a deliverance vouchsafed to his afflicted church, and for raising up so useful a minister of his gospel. But this was a designation only to the apostolical office.' Hammond. This however shows, that God's eternal purpose and his prescience do not interfere with man's free agency and responsibility. St. Paul would not have ascribed his conversion in any degree to himself, but altogether to the grace of God; and so would the compilers of our articles: 'they being called according to God's purpose, by his spirit working in them in due season; they through grace obey the calling.'—In me. (16) This may be rendered, "To me." The same preposition is used just after, and translated "among," it might be, "to the heathen." The apostle, however, speaks of immediate prophetical revelation, and not of ordinary divine teaching.—'Since we are told, (Acts 9:19.) that after Saul recovered his sight and strength, he was certain days with the disciples at Damascus, during which he preached Christ in the synagogues: ... we must admit, that ... he spent a few days in preaching at Damascus, and then retired into Arabia, ... to receive further revelations.' Macknight.—James the brother, &c. (19) Probably, James was the son of Cleopas, or Alpheus, and Mary the sister of our Lord's mother. (Matt. 13:55. Mark 6:3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. All authority and ability to preach the gospel must come "from Jesus Christ, and from God the Father who hath raised him from the dead." In all ordinary circumstances, indeed, men are employed as instruments, in qualifying and ordaining ministers; but, without "the grace," teaching, and unction of the Spirit of Christ, which should be sought by constant, fervent prayer, all that man can do, however scriptural, must prove ineffectual.—We ought also to pray for "grace and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ," in behalf of those of whom we doubt whether they be true saints.—The love of Christ in "giving himself for our sins," and the hopes and motives which his redemption inspires, are effectual "to deliver" the true believer "from this present world," as well as "from the wrath to come." This was intended by the divine Redeemer; it accords to the will of God, and is requisite for the display of his glory: and the consciousness of being rescued and separated from those who were our companions in sin; made victorious over the fear of men, and the love of the world; enabled to refuse conformity to it, and to live a spiritual and heavenly life on earth, forms the proper evidence of justification in the righteousness of Christ, and through faith in him: yet numbers, who profess evangelical doctrines, seem to have no inclination to this part of God's salvation. But, as they are not "delivered from this present evil world" by the sanctification of the Spirit; it is presumptuous in them to expect exemption from its condemnation by the blood of Jesus.

V. 6—10. It is truly astonishing how soon and how frequently hopeful converts are removed from the ministry of those by whom they were "first called to the grace of Christ;" and how easily they are induced to embrace "other gospels," either more flattering to self-righteous pride, or more favourable to self-indulgence. These modifications of divine truth indeed are not "the gospel;" but the devices of Satan, to deceive the unstable, to trouble the injudicious, and to pervert Christianity. While we strenuously maintain, that every kind and degree of Antinomianism eventually and powerfully tends to dishonour Christ, and destroy true religion; we must also declare in the most decided manner, that all dependence on good works, real or supposed, for justification, is still more fatal to the individuals who persist in it, at least after the truth has been fully and repeatedly set before them. No wonder that the preachers of morality and good works, as the foundation for the sinner's hope of acceptance, or in any degree conducive to his justification, are so evidently unsuccessful in their attempts to make men virtuous: for, if they had apostolical endowments, yea, angelic capacities, eloquence, and purity; they, their whole system, and all who cleave to it, lie under the awful and explicit curse of God: and this must blight all their labours, and finally ruin their souls, unless they are previously convinced of their fatal mistake.—While we zealously preach and diligently practise "good works," for evangelical purposes; let us be even still more careful, if possible, not to put any thing which we do in the place of "that righteousness of God which is unto and upon all that believe;" and not to advance any thing, which may betray others into so fatal a delusion. (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26. Phil. 3:8—11.)—Instead of presumptuously applying the apostle's authoritative and most awful words to those who differ from us, or in any other way than by a general declaration of the truth; let us for ourselves keep at the utmost distance from the terrible anathema, and caution all men against those who thus "pervert the gospel of Christ." In so important a cause, we must not regard the friendship, or fear the frowns of men; nor seek their favour, by the persuasive words of human wisdom: but be satisfied with desiring and hoping for the acceptance and blessing of God, in our endeavours to vindicate his truth. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.) Indeed, none are "the servants of Christ," who seek "to please men" as their object; and few, who actually "please men" in general, give sufficient evidence that they honestly and faithfully serve Christ: for how can he be pleased with that testimony and conduct, which is acceptable to carnal men, in whom "the god of this world" dwells and works? Ministers therefore should be careful not to receive or preach a carnalized gospel; and not to rest in human teaching, but to study the written revelation of Jesus Christ, and to pray continually for "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation" in the knowledge of him; that they may "please men" only for their good, and to their edification, and not desire to please them any further. (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.)

V. 11—24. The "conversation" and habitual conduct of many who are now eminent Christians and ministers, was once most contrary to the truth and grace of the gospel. Zealous Pharisees and furious persecutors have been made monuments of the Redeemer's power and love: and though their apparent profiting in some unscriptural or anti-scriptural system of theology, and in the general knowledge connected with such studies, before their conversion, tended only to their own greater condemnation, and to render them more dangerous and zealous opponents of the truth: yet it has afterwards been over ruled for the glory of God and their more abundant usefulness.—The Lord suffers many whom he has chosen for his work, to proceed in opposition to him for a course of years: but when "he calls them by his grace," and reveals the glory and preciousness of Christ to their souls their enmity is subdued, their lusts dethroned, their hearts changed, and they willingly devote themselves to his service. When his command is concerned, they do not "confer with flesh and blood," but renounce all worldly prospects, and venture all consequences for his sake. And though, in ordinary cases, it would be presumptuous for new converts, or young ministers, to disregard the counsels of such as have before been employed in the work of Christ; yet that love to Christ and the souls of men, which renders them superior to lucrative considerations, and ready to endure hardships in order to spread the gospel; is a good evidence that the Lord is preparing them for future usefulness.—In speaking of the Lord's dealings with us, and the services for which he has enabled us; we should scrupulously adhere to the truth, as in the sight of God: and when they, who opposed and would have destroyed the faith, are brought to embrace and preach it; we are called upon to "glorify God on their behalf," though they be unknown by face to us.

NOTES.—Chap. II. V. 1—5. It appears from the history, that Paul and Barnabas went up from Antioch to carry the alms of the Christians in that city to the elders at Jerusalem. But they had at that time no special business with the apostles, and it is not certain that they saw any of them. (Note, Acts 11:27—30.) The journey however here mentioned, most evidently is that recorded by the historian, when they went up on purpose about the very question, which St. Paul was here debating with the Galatians. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Acts 15:1—11.)—Most expositors date this journey fourteen years after the apostle's conversion, which scarcely allows sufficient time for all the intervening transactions; and it seems more obvious to compute the years from the first journey before mentioned. (Note, 1:15—24.) There is, however, but little certainty in the computation of times, even by the most learned chronologers, as to the date of the apostle's conversion, subsequent history, and the writing of his epistles; and exactness in this respect is comparatively of little importance.—By the direction of God, who immediately revealed himself to the apostle, or some other prophet, on this occasion, he and Barnabas went to Jerusalem about the question of the Gentile converts being required to obey the ritual law of Moses: and this was the only instance in which there had been the least appearance of inferiority in him to the other apostles. At that time, he fully declared the whole of "that gospel, which he preached among the Gentiles," to them, and to other eminent persons at Jerusalem: but he did this "privately;" lest, if he had openly avowed it to the whole church, especially respecting the virtual abrogation of the ceremonial law; the strong prejudices of the multitude against him and the Gentiles, and for the Mosaic law, should have excited commotions, and led to such measures, as might have prevented his future usefulness, and even to subvert the churches which he had already planted. It would at length be fully known, both that he admitted the Gentiles into the church without circumcision, and that he did not consider the Mosaic law as binding on the conscience even of the Jewish converts. But, as his object was to obtain the sanction of the church at Jerusalem to his doctrine, in order to silence the Judaizing teachers, it was very prudent to open the business privately to the apostles; that, being proposed and supported by them, it might come before the other elders with more weight than Paul himself could give it in so prejudiced an audience. Yet, while he used this precaution, he would not consent that Titus should be circumcised, contrary to his judgment and inclination: and probably he took that excellent Gentile convert with him on purpose, that in the case of one on whom he could depend, he might show his steadfastness to his principles, on so critical an occasion. (Marg. Ref. c—i. Notes, Acts 16:1—3. 2 Cor. 2:12,13. 7:13—16. 8:16—24. 12:17—21. Tit. Preface. Note, 1:1—4.) For both his journey to Jerusalem, and his conduct there, especially in respect of Titus, were intended to counteract the designs of "false brethren," professed Christians and teachers, who had, in an unsuspected manner, got admission into the church at Antioch: and who came as spies to observe the liberty which the Gentile converts, and even those of the Jews, used in respect of the law, according to the truth and will of Christ; in order that they might bring the Gentiles into bondage to the legal ceremonies, as well as oblige the apostle and his coadjutors, to be more observant of them. (Marg. Ref. k—n.) He was indeed always disposed to make allowance for men's prejudices, and to deal gently with weak consciences, in order to promote the gospel: (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) but he would not give place at all, "by way of subjection" to the law, or to those who imposed it on men's consciences, and represented it as necessary to salvation. Nay, he strenuously resisted all such attempts; in order that "the truth of the gospel," which these Jewish teachers were labouring to pervert and corrupt, might remain in the Gentile churches. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)

V. 6—10. The false brethren disparaged Paul, as if little account was to be made of him; but Peter, James, and John, "seemed to be somewhat" in their estimation. This marked distinction was made, in order that by using the names of these apostles, they might the more successfully oppose the truth: for the opinion of others concerning them, not their own estimate of themselves, is exclusively meant. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) But St. Paul declared, that it was "no matter to him," what they or others were, as to their endowments, authority, or reputation: for God did not thus partially accept of men's persons; or determine right and wrong, truth and falsehood, by the repute in which they who taught them were held. (Marg. Ref. s.) However highly therefore he loved and honoured Peter, James, and John, as brethren and faithful eminent servants of their common Lord, he would not put them in Christ's stead, or acknowledge that they had any authority over him: (Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.) nor indeed, when he conferred with them, had they added, or attempted to add, any thing to his knowledge of the gospel, or authority to preach it, or even to his spiritual gifts and miraculous powers. (Notes, Acts 15:12—29.) On the contrary, they were convinced that Christ had immediately appointed him to be his apostle, and principal minister in preaching the gospel among the Gentiles; even as Peter was the leading person in the work carrying on among the Jews; and had qualified him as fully, and wrought by him as mightily, in the one case, as he had Peter in the other. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) So that these three apostles, "who seemed" to many persons "to be pillars," on whom every thing depended, saw and acknowledged the grace of God bestowed on Paul; and allowed of him and Barnabas, as fellow-labourers, of equal authority and ability with themselves; being satisfied that they should labour principally among the Gentiles, while themselves would at present continue among the Jews. Only, considering the low condition of the Jewish converts, and the expenses which they had incurred soon after the day of Pentecost; they desired them to remember and raise some contributions for their poor, among the Gentile converts; which Paul was very ready to do, and accordingly did without delay, and with great earnestness, notwithstanding their prejudices against him.—The event of this conference in other respects was well known. (Marg Ref. z—f. Notes, 2 Cor. 11:1—6,21—23 12:11—13.)

V. 11—16. The wisdom of God, in permitting the transaction here recorded, is very conspicuous: for it demon-withstood him to the face, [t]because he was to be blamed.

12 For, before that [u]certain came from James, [v]he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, [w]he withdrew, and separated himself, [x]fearing them which were of the circumcision.

13 And [y]the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was [z]carried away with their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that they [a]walked not uprightly, according to [b]the truth of the gospel, [c]I said unto Peter before them all, [d]If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, [e]why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are [f]Jews by nature, and not [g]sinners of the Gentiles,

16 Knowing [h]that a man is not justified by the works of the law, [i]but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even [k]we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: [l]for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified. [Practical Observations.]

17 But if, [m]while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also [n]are found sinners, [o]is therefore Christ the minister of sin? [p]God forbid.

strably proves the pope's pretended infallibility and supremacy, as derived from Peter, (no one can tell in what manner,) to be the most groundless fiction imaginable; and it tends exceedingly to establish the doctrine of justification by faith alone.—After the decree of the council at Jerusalem, Peter on some account went down to Antioch; and, knowing that the Mosaic law was no longer obligatory on the conscience, he did not scruple to eat and converse freely with the Gentiles. (Notes, Acts 10:9—23. 11:1—17. 15:1—29.) Yet, when certain Jewish converts came from James to him, he "separated" from the Gentiles, lest he should incur the censure of the Jews. Thus he showed more fear of man than regard to the truth of the gospel; (Notes, Prov. 24:24,25. Is. 57:11,12. Matt. 26:69—75.) he confirmed the prejudices of the Jewish converts, and strengthened the hands of the Judaizing teachers; he weakened the influence of St. Paul and other ministers; he set an example of dissimulation, which was followed by the other Jews; and which even seduced Barnabas himself, who had been St. Paul's coadjutor among the Gentiles; and he threw additional hinderances in the way of their conversion. This sufficiently proved him to be both fallible and sinful in himself; though he was guided by the Spirit of God to deliver the gospel to mankind, free from error or corrupt mixture. (Notes, Matt. 16:18,19.) As, however, he was so evidently blameable, Paul, though probably a much younger man, and called to the apostleship long after Peter, deemed himself bound openly to withstand him. (Marg. Ref. h, i.) A private remonstrance would not suffice, on so public and important an occasion; and he would not speak against him behind his back. (Notes, Matt. 18:15—17.) But he took an opportunity, in the presence of the whole church, to expostulate with him concerning his disingenuous conduct; demanding of him, how it was that he, being a Jew, should in many respects and on many occasions live like the Gentiles, without observing the Mosaic law; and yet should inconsistently employ the influence of his example and authority, to induce, and even to "compel," the Gentile converts to submit to circumcision, and obey that law. (Marg. Ref. l—u.) For they, who were naturally of the stock of Israel, and thus had been born and educated Jews; and who had formerly been strictly observant of the Mosaic law, and not idolatrous sinners like the Gentiles; being at length fully convinced that a man could not be justified before God by his own obedience, in any sense; (Notes, Rom. 3:19—31.) but that this blessing must be obtained by the faith of Jesus Christ; even they had renounced all dependence on the law, and fled to Christ by faith, that they might be justified in him alone, without the works of the law. Why then should Peter, and other Jewish converts, draw the attention of the Gentiles to the legal ceremonies; and intimate to them, that they were not fully brought into the church of Christ, because they did not submit to them? Did not this sanction those teachers who instructed them to depend on them, in part, at least, for justification? Whereas they well knew, that "by the works of the law no flesh could be justified before God." (Marg. Ref. x—e.)—The occasion of this declaration was doubtless taken from the ceremonial law: but the argument, as it respects justification, is equally conclusive against all dependence on the works of the moral law, as absolutely inconsistent with the method of justification according to the gospel.—This certainly took place some years before the apostle's last journey to Jerusalem, as recorded by St. Luke; and it is an additional argument, in support of the view before given of St. Paul's conduct at that juncture. (Notes, Acts 21:17—26.)—The conduct of Peter, on this trying occasion, seems to have been peculiarly excellent.—Sinners of the Gentiles. (15) As distinguished from "sinners," who were not "Gentiles." V. 17—21. It is not agreed among expositors, whether the apostle's address to Peter continues to the end of the chapter, or where it terminates if it does not: but the doctrine is the same, however this may be decided.—If then, while the apostles and their converts from among the Jews renounced their legal confidence, and sought to be justified by Christ; it should at length be found, that they were yet sinners, unpardoned, unjustified, through the insufficiency of his righteousness and atonement to justify them, or of faith to give them an interest in it; except they returned back to the law, and taught the Gentile converts to Judaize: it would follow, that Christ was "the minister of sin," and the gospel "the ministration of condemnation," instead of "the ministration of the Spirit," and "of righteousness." (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, 1 Cor. 15:12—18. 2 Cor. 3:7—11.)—But "God forbid" that such things should be spoken of Christ and his gospel! This appears to be the meaning of the verse, as it stands connected in the apostle's argument. At first sight indeed it may seem rather to relate to the sins, which are found in those who profess to be justified by Christ. These should not be charged on the doctrine, or on the insufficiency of his grace to sanctify them: as if he were "the minister of sin," and allowed men to continue in it; or as if there was any need to go back to the law on that account. The former interpretation, however, is most approved, and indeed justly 'Christ is then "the Minister of sin," and not of justification.'—'Must it not follow that he is so if he hath introduced an imperfect dispensation, which will not sufficiently ensure the happiness of those that follow it. Yea, doth he not indeed teach sin, if justification indeed cannot be obtained without the law, in teaching men to renounce all dependence on it, as it is certain by his gospel he doth?' Doddridge.—If then Paul, or the other apostles, should, either by doctrine or example, countenance the opinion, that the law must be obeyed, in order to justification; thus "building again what they had destroyed," they would become transgressors, and liable to condemnation. And if Christians from among the Jews should return back to a dependence on the law; they would vainly attempt to erect again that old building which they had destroyed, in order to make Christ their Foundation, (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Rom. 10:1—4.) which would again bring them under condemnation, and leave their sins both unpardoned and unsubdued. (Note, 5:1—6.)—This was indeed very different from the apostle's own experience in this matter: for, through his knowledge of the strictness, extent, spirituality, excellency, and sanction of the moral law, as well as of the typical import of the ceremonies, he was become "dead to the law;" he expected no help from it in the matter of justification; and he was divorced from it as a legal covenant, that he might welcome Christ and his salvation. The union between him and the law, in this sense, was finally dissolved, as the marriage-relation is by death. (Notes, Rom. 3:19,20. 7:1—4.) He hoped and feared nothing from it; any more than a dead man did from his friends or his enemies (Note, Rom. 6:1—4.) But the effect of this was not a careless, lawless life: on the contrary, this "dying to the law" was necessary, in order "that he might live to God," and be devoted to him, through the motives, encouragements, and grace of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) Indeed, he was even "crucified with Christ:" the demands of the law on him [illegible]

18 For [o]if build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

19 For I [p]through the law am [q]dead to the law, that I might live unto God.

20 I am [r]crucified with Christ: [s]nevertheless, I live; yet not I, [t]but Christ liveth in me: and [u]the life which I now live in the flesh, [v]I live by the faith of [w]the Son of God, [x]who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I [y]do not frustrate the grace of God: for if [z]righteousness come by the law, then [a]Christ dead in vain.

been answered by his Surety, in his obedience unto the death upon the cross; and his union with Christ had made him die to all legal dependences, as well as to the love and friendship of the world, the delights and interest of sin, and all those carnal principles from which his former activity arose. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 5:22—26. 6:11—14. Rom. 6:5—7,8—11. Col. 2:20—23.) "Nevertheless he lived," in a new and evangelical hope, by the communication of a divine life to his soul, by new capacities of enjoyment, and new motives and principles, and, as it were, main springs of activity. Yet, it was not so much he that lived, as "Christ who lived in him," by his Spirit, and his power and grace, regulating his judgment and affections, transforming him into his own image, and employing him as the instrument of his glory. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, John 6:52—58, v. 56. 14:21—24, v. 23. 17:22,23. 2 Cor. 13:5,6. Eph. 2:19—22. 3:14—19, v. 17. Col. 1:25—27, v. 27. 1 John 4:9—17, vv. 12—16. Rev. 3:20—22, v. 20.) So that the life, which he then "lived in the flesh," surrounded with worldly objects and temptations, was not conducted upon carnal principles, or by a regard to external things, but "by the faith of the Son of God;" as he depended on him for all things, and aimed to do all according to his will, and in subserviency to his glory. (Marg. Ref. p—s. Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 10:1—6. Col. 3:16,17.) And to this he was influenced by the consideration, that this glorious Saviour had loved him, when a bitter persecutor, and had given himself to the death upon the cross, as a sacrifice for his sins. So that while he neglected no acceptable obedience, and declined no self-denying service, yet he attended to all his duties, from such principles and for such purposes, that "he did not frustrate" or set aside "the grace of God," by attempting in any measure to justify himself by his works: being fully assured, that if righteousness could have been obtained by any obedience of man "to law" of whatever kind, consistently with the glory of God, then Christ had died without any necessity, and to no purpose. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) As therefore no Christian could suppose, that so stupendous a plan as that of redemption was formed and executed, without any occasion: it must also be concluded, that righteousness could in no degree be obtained by a sinner, on account of his obedience to any law. This holds equally true of the moral, as of the ceremonial law, and indeed of every rule which can be prescribed for the conduct of men in any age or nation. It was of small moment whether men observed the ritual law or not, except as they depended on it: and the concluding part of the apostle's argument related to the moral law, at least equally with the ceremonial.—"I through the law have died by law; so that I must live by God." (19)—'We all, through breaking law, have died by the curse of law; so that, if we live, we must live by the free-gift of God, and not by law.' Macknight. If this learned and laborious writer had made it intelligible what he meant by 'have died by the curse of the law,' his novel interpretation would have required further notice. But the author owns himself unable to affix any precise meaning to the words used, in this and several places of his translation and paraphrase. "I have died to the law" is explained by "I have been crucified with Christ."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Whilst we simply depend on God to prosper our labours, we should use every prudent method of obviating misapprehensions, and counteracting the designs of opposers, "lest by any means we should run in vain:" and this may commonly be connected with decided firmness in important cases.—False brethren and teachers are generally "brought in unawares." We must expect spies in our congregations, who come on purpose to find something to cavil at, or object to; in order to deprive us of our Christian liberty, by bringing us into bondage to human impositions, or groundless fears; or through extravagant notions of liberty, to keep men in slavery to sin and Satan. We must not "give place," in such matters, "by way of subjection," in any measure; lest "the truth of the gospel" should be obscured or disgraced.—"False brethren" often profess an undue regard to ministers of established reputation; in order to disparage others perhaps of equal ability and faithfulness, whose line of duty requires them to proceed in a somewhat different manner. But they should be shown, "that God accepteth no man's person:" and that all the servants are as nothing, in comparison of their common Lord; who will never approve of those who "call man master upon earth," that they may more effectually counteract the zealous endeavours of others who are "fellow-labourers of God." (Note, 1 Cor. 3:4—9.) The question is not, Who said, or who did, such and such things? but merely, What was said and done? and, did it accord to the word of God, or not? Frequently those ministers, whom captious or injudicious persons magnify against others, "in conference add nothing to them:" nor indeed do they materially differ from them; except as the different descriptions of men, among whom they labour, induce them to conduct their work with some circumstantial variations. And they generally see that God hath called them to their different spheres of usefulness, and become mutually desirous, by love and good offices, to strengthen each other's hands: while many ignorantly suppose, or maliciously declare, that they are opposing one another. But, whether our differences of sentiment be real or imaginary; we should all be "forward to remember the poor," especially such as have impoverished themselves for the sake of the gospel; even should they have imbibed strong prejudices against us and "our work and labour of love."

V. 11—16. "The fear of man bringeth a snare," to an extent of which few are fully aware: and we need not wonder to see pious persons ashamed, or afraid, openly to countenance those whom they inwardly favour; or boldly to avow themselves on controverted points, when their opinions are unpopular: for Peter himself, even at an advanced period of his most zealous, bold, and useful ministry, was induced thus to prevaricate! But even a man equal to an apostle, or "the chiefest of the apostles," who "walks not uprightly according to the gospel," is to be blamed and condemned, in this respect, and "withstood to his face," when the matter is evident and important: for the more eminent he is, the greater mischief will follow from the example; so that other distinguished persons also will "be carried away" with such a sanctioned "dissimulation."—Public offences must be publicly reproved, that the evil may be effectually counteracted (Note, 1 Tim. 5:19,20.)—We must "cease from man," and "know no one after the flesh," if we would follow the Lord fully; for "verily every man in his best estate is altogether vanity." Christ is the only infallible Head of his church: all pretenders to this title on earth are antichrists; and they who cannot endure to be blamed, or to acknowledge themselves mistaken, are of a very unchristian temper.—Men are seldom aware of the magnitude or fatal consequences of their errors or carnal compliances: yet they should be fairly pointed out to them, that they may be put upon their guard. Whatever be our nation, religious profession, education, or outward character; if real and established Christians, we know that "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." This conviction has led us to believe in Christ, and rely on him, that we "might be justified by faith" in him: and, while we adhere to this principle, all our most spiritual worship and devoted zealous obedience will be entirely disregarded by us in the grand concern of justification, and be wholly performed from other motives and to other purposes; namely, to show the sincerity of our grateful adoring love, to "adorn the gospel of God our Saviour," to glorify God, and to do what good we can to our brethren, and to all men.

V. 17—21. We make "Christ the Minister of sin," if we suppose that his righteousness and atonement are insufficient to justify the believer: even as others make him the "Minister of sin," by allowing themselves in disobedience, from a presumptuous confidence of being justified by his righteousness, and saved without being sanctified.—The believer, "through the law, is become dead to the law," not that he may continue in sin, but that "he may live unto God:" and the more simply he relies on Christ for every thing, the more devotedly does he walk before him, in all his ordinances and commandments. He is "crucified with Christ," to the world and sin, as well as to all legal dependences and proud confidence. His ambition, avarice, and desire of sensual or dissipated pleasure, and of pomp or power, with every angry or malignant passion, the great and efficacious springs of human activity, are mortified, and as it were broken and deprived of energy: so that, if other principles equally operative were not implanted, he would be almost without stimulus to any kind or degree of activity. But he is united with Christ and conformed to him; he, as it were, rises, lives, and ascends with Christ: yea, Christ lives and reigns in him, and speaks and acts by him: and, as far as he is brought under this sacred influence, his words and works resemble those of his Lord, and all his powers are employed in his

CHAPTER III.

The apostle sharply reproves the Galatians, for departing from that gospel which had been fully preached to them, and confirmed by the gift of the Holy Spirit, 1–5. He proves the doctrine of justification by faith alone from the example of Abraham, and the testimony of Scripture, 6–9; from the curse of the law, and the redemption of Christ, 10–14; and from the Abrahamic covenant, which the law could not disannul, 15–18. He states the use of the law, in connexion with the covenant of grace; shows that all men are by the law shut up under sin, till Christ releases them; and describes the law as a schoolmaster to bring men to him, that they may be justified by faith, 19–24; and that all believers are delivered from the law, and made the spiritual seed of Abraham by faith in Christ, 25–29.

O [a]FOOLISH Galatians, [b]who hath bewitched you, that [c]ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes [d]Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?

2 This only would I learn of you, [e]Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or [f]by the hearing of faith?

3 Are ye so foolish? [g]having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?

4 Have [h]ye suffered [i]so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain.

5 He therefore [i]that ministereth to you the Spirit, and [k]worketh miracles among you, doeth he it [l]by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

[Practical Observations.]

6 Even [m]as Abraham believed God, and it was [t]accounted to him for righteousness.

7 [n]Know ye therefore, that [o]they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham.

8 And [p]the Scripture, [q]foreseeing that [r]God would justify the heathen through faith, [s]preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, [t]In thee shall all nations be blessed.

9 So then [u]they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.

10 For [x]as many as are of the works of the law are [y]under the curse: for it is written, [r]Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

11 But [a]that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, [b]The just shall live by faith.

12 And [c]the law is not of faith: but, [d]the man that doeth them shall live in them.

service. He lives here on earth, "by faith in the Son of God," which "worketh by love," love of God and of man; this induces zealous active obedience, and effects a progressive transformation into his holy image: and this proportionably enables him to use the language of full assurance, and to say, "He loved me and gave himself for me." Thus he neither perverts nor "frustrates the grace of God:" for this proposition, "that if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain," is the bane of all self-justifying schemes, however refined or ingenious they be: and all who cleave to them would certainly have deemed this language to be enthusiasm, if the apostle had not used it concerning his own experience; and if it had first been spoken by some zealous modern defender of the doctrine of grace against the objections of Pharisees, and the perversions of Antinomians.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—5. Having authenticated his ministry and doctrine, by a statement of facts, the apostle proceeded more directly to argue the point with the Galatians; whom he sharply reproved, as destitute of wisdom and understanding, in thus unaccountably turning away from the truth of Christ. He demanded, therefore, "who had bewitched them," by the sorcery of their insidious insinuations, "that they should not obey the truth," which required them to seek justification by faith in Christ alone. For it certainly could be owing to nothing less than fascination, for them to seek it "by the works of the law:" seeing the gospel had been so fully explained, and earnestly enforced upon them; and all things relating to the sufferings of Christ, and the need, motive, intenseness, and benefit of them, had been set before them, in so distinct, pathetic, affecting, and lively a manner, by the preaching of the gospel, and the administration of the Lord's supper; that "Jesus Christ had," as it were, been "evidently set forth, as crucified before their eyes," and in the midst of them. And could it have been previously imagined, that the impressions which seemed to be thus made upon their minds, would so soon be erased? (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—The argument, however, might be reduced to a very compendious decision: the apostle only desired to know from them, whether they had received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of those preachers, who proselyted them to the Jewish law; or from him who brought them the joyful report of free salvation by faith in Christ? (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, Rom. 10:5—17.) As they must know, that they received these gifts by him, and not by their legal teachers; could they be so absurd as to suppose that they had indeed begun to worship and serve God, in a spiritual and acceptable manner, by the preaching of a doctrine warranted and evidently attested by the Holy Spirit; but that the work had been left imperfect, and was now to be completed by teachers who possessed no miraculous powers, at least could impart none to others; and who only instructed them in external ordinances, a bodily exercise, of which carnal men were as capable as the most spiritual man on earth! (Marg. Ref. g. Note, Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.) They had, indeed, endured many persecutions, especially from the Jews: and would they at length prove their profession of Christianity to be "vain," and lose all the benefit of their sufferings, by renouncing the grace of the gospel, to rely, in part at least, on legal observances? The apostle hoped that it would not yet be thus "in vain:" but it certainly must be so, unless they could be recovered from the fatal mistake. (Marg. Ref. h. Note, 5:1—6.) He must therefore again demand of them, whether the supply of the Spirit, and miraculous powers had been given them from the Lord, by means of the preachers of legal observances, or by the ministers of the gospel.—This open appeal to the Galatians, who were under the influence of those who opposed the apostle's authority, is a full demonstration, that these gifts were actually communicated to them by his ministry. The abruptness and repetitions of his questions also prove, that his mind was greatly agitated by their misconduct, and show how important he deemed their mistake; and we cannot doubt that he regarded all their profession, and sufferings in consequence of it, to be altogether in vain, in case they persisted in it.—This is of the greatest importance in the argument: for submission to the ceremonial law, though burdensome, would not have been a renunciation of the gospel, if it had not implied a dependence on their own works, instead of the righteousness and propitiatory sacrifice of Christ; and this dependence must be equally incompatible with the grace of the gospel, even when the obedience itself is necessary from other motives, and for other purposes.—Obey the truth. (1) The truth is obeyed when its directions are observed; but disobeyed when these are neglected, in order to render obedience to other directors or injunctions. V. 6—9. "Abraham believed God," &c. (Notes, Gen. 15:5,6. Rom. 4:1—5.) The example of Abraham was sufficient to determine, that those who sought justification by faith only were his children, and interested in the blessings promised to him: and the Holy Spirit, who inspired the writers of the Scriptures, foreseeing the calling of the Gentiles, and their "justification by faith in Christ," preached "before the gospel unto Abraham" in few words, when God said, "In thee shall all nations be blessed:" that is, 'By virtue of their relation to the promised Seed, which shall descend from thee, sinners of all nations shall, through faith, be made completely happy in the favour of God, and the enjoyment of everlasting life.' (Marg. Ref. p—t. Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 18:18,19. 22:16—18.) So then they, who sought acceptance in this way of simply believing, were blessed after the example of "believing Abraham." (Notes, 26—29. Rom. 4:14—17.)—The Scripture foreseeing, &c. (8) What can this mean, unless "the Scripture" is considered as "the Word of God," who foresaw, and thus revealed his determinate purpose and foreknowledge in this particular? 13 Christ hath [e]redeemed us from the curse of the law, [f]being made a curse for us: [g]for it is written, [h]Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree:

14 That [i]the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles [k]through Jesus Christ; that we [l]might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith. [Practical Observations.]

15 Brethren, [m]I speak after the manner of men: Though [n]it be but a man's [o]covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto.

16 Now [o]to Abraham and his seed, were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy Seed, [q]which is Christ.

17 And [q]this I say, That [r]the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, [s]which was four hundred and thirty years after, [t]cannot disannul, [u]that it should make the promise of [x]none effect.

18 For [y]if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: [z]but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

even of his posterity, who sought to be justified by their own obedience "to the works of the law," with all those who in any way remained under the covenant of works, abode under the curse, according to the testimony of the law itself. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Note, Deut. 27:26.) The passage here quoted follows a variety of curses denounced against transgressors of the moral law; which shows that this was principally referred to. Indeed, the legal dispensation, considered as a covenant of works, was intended: believers were always under the covenant of grace, by faith in the Saviour as promised from the beginning, and prefigured especially by the sacrificing of innocent animals: unbelievers always made the whole law a complex covenant of works; and the nation of Israel was under the Sinai-covenant, in respect of the land of Canaan, and their peculiar privileges. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 20:1.) But after the promulgation of the gospel, the whole became entirely a covenant of works, even as much as that of Adam. (Note, 4: 21—31.) Under a covenant of this kind, in one form or other, all men continue, as the rational and accountable creatures of God; and, being transgressors of his law, even according to their own obscure notions of it, they are exposed to the curse and wrath of God, and remain under it, unless they believe in Christ. (Note, Rom. 2:12—16.) But as the apostle was arguing with Judaizers, he led their attention to the written law itself; which could not confer the blessing, but must denounce the curse upon them: for they had not "confirmed it," or "continued" from the beginning of their lives to that day; and would not to the end of life continue "in all things written in the law," so as to perform a perfect obedience to them.—It was therefore evident at the first glance, that no man could be justified by a law which peremptorily demanded an obedience so absolute and perfect, as no mere man ever yet rendered to it. But it was further evident, as God had declared another way of justification and eternal life. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Hab. 2:4. Rom. 1:17. Heb. 10:35—39.) Now "the way of faith," by which alone the most righteous of our fallen race can live before God, is perfectly distinct from, yea opposite to that of the law, which never proposes life, but upon the terms of perfect obedience. (Marg. Ref. a —d. Notes, Lev. 18:5. Matt. 19:16—22. Mark 12:28—34. Luke 10:25—29. Rom. 10:5—11.) Every one, therefore, who has not performed this condition, is "under the curse;" but "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law," or bought us off by a price paid, having been willingly "made a curse" in our stead. For, as it was the purpose of God thus to deliver men from wrath, by the ignominious and agonizing sufferings of his beloved Son upon the cross, and all the punishment which he then endured: so he declared that kind of punishment to be "accursed," and an emblem of his most dreadful vengeance, when it was written, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." (Marg. Ref. e—h. Note, Deut. 21:22,23.) Thus, when the holy and divine Saviour was suspended on the cross, it appeared that he endured "the curse of the law" in our stead. In this most wonderful and gracious manner the way was opened for "the blessing of Abraham," even the "righteousness of faith," and friendship with God, to be conferred, not only on the Jews, but on the Gentiles also, through Christ and "by faith in him;" and that they too might receive the promised gifts of the Spirit, by faith, to seal to them the truth of the gospel; and his sanctifying grace, to seal to them their own free justification. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 1—5. Acts 2:14—21. 2 Cor. 1:23,24. Jam. 2:21—24.)—It is evident, that the apostle supposed the Gentiles to be "under the curse of the law," as well as the Jews, but in another form; else they would not have needed this redemption and justification. —The just, &c. (11) Or, "the just by faith shall live." This is the more exact translation: and as "the righteousness of faith" does not secure men from temporal death, in any form, or at any time; so deliverance from eternal condemnation, and to eternal life in heaven, must be intended.—Curse of, &c. (13) As Christ died, not to deliver us from temporal death, but from "the wrath to come;" it is manifest, that "the curse of the law," whether the law of Moses, or any law under which men are supposed to be, is eternal damnation, and not temporal or temporary punishment. Christ indeed did not suffer eternal damnation; for, being God as well as man, his temporary sufferings constituted an infinite satisfaction to divine justice, and the fullest display of the evil of sin, and the honour of the divine law, which can be conceived. —Many expositors, who contend against the imputation of Christ's righteousness to believers, in disputing against Socinians, argue for the vicarious sufferings of Christ in our stead. Now what is this but imputation? He, though perfectly holy, paid the debt which we sinners had contracted. "It was exacted, and he became answerable." We sinners, on believing, are "made the righteousness of God in him," and receive the inheritance which he merited. Thus there is a reciprocal imputation. (Notes, Is. 53:4—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 24. 3:17,18.) Yet, as the imputation of sin did not render the Saviour either criminal or polluted, but had its effect merely in his receiving the punishment which we deserved, so the imputation of his righteousness does not render us free either from criminality or pollution; but merely entitles us to the reward of his righteousness. We have still the same need of humiliation and repentance, of sanctification, and personal obedience and holiness, without which we have no evidence that we are made the righteousness of God in him.—'I wonder that Jerome and Erasmus should labour, and seek for, I know not what figure of speech, to show that Christ was not called "accursed." Truly in this is placed all our hope: in this the infinite love of God is manifested; in this is placed our salvation, that our God, properly and without any figure, poured out all his wrath on his own Son; ... caused him ... to be accursed, that he might receive us into favour. Finally, without any figure, "Christ was made a curse for us," in such a manner, that unless he had been truly God, he must have remained under the curse for ever, from which for our sakes he emerged. For indeed, if the obedience of the Son of God be figurative and imaginary, so must our hope of glory be. Beza.—The Spirit. (14) The departure of the Spirit of life and holiness, when Adam sinned, left him spiritually dead, and proved him a condemned criminal; the gift of the Spirit of life and holiness, in Christ Jesus, is the source of spiritual life, and the seal of his justification.—The miraculous or extraordinary gifts of the Spirit cannot, therefore, be exclusively meant; yet they are specially referred to. (Note, 1—5.)—Cursed is every one, &c. (10) Nearly from the LXX, which adds πασι to what is found in the Hebrew, which does not at all alter the meaning. (Note, Deut. 26:26.)—The just, &c. (11) Nearly from the LXX. (Hab. 2:4.)—Cursed is every one, &c. (13) This varies considerably from the LXX, but it conveys the exact meaning of the passage. (Deut. 21:23.)

V. 15—18. The apostle proceeded to ground another argument upon the case of Abraham. Speaking of the high concerns of God's dealings with his creatures, after "the manner of men" when dealing with each other; he reminded the Galatians, that even a covenant between men, when fully ratified, could not be "disannulled," or have any new conditions added to it, without the explicit consent of all parties. Now the formal ratification of the covenant with Abraham, and its express promises to him and his Seed, took place long before the Mosaic law; and could not therefore be altered or disannulled by it. Neither did the Lord include all the descendants of Abraham in these promises, as so many distinct kinds of seed: but they were limited to him, and "his Seed," in the singular number, which implied that Christ was principally meant, and others only as related to him, and regarded as one with him. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Gen. 17:4—8. Rom. 9:6—14. 1 Cor. 12:12—26.) The unbelieving descendants of Jacob were no more interested in the most 19 Wherefore [a]then serveth the law? [b]It was added because of transgressions, [c]till the Seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained [d]by angels [e]in the hand of a mediator.

20 Now [f]a mediator is not a mediator of one; [g]but God is one.

21 Is [h]the law then against the promises of God? [i]God forbid: [k]for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily [l]righteousness should have been by the law.

22 But the Scripture hath [m]concluded all under sin, [n]that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given [o]to them that believe.

[Practical Observations.]

valuable promises, than the posterity of Ishmael and Esau were: while all believers, though of Gentile extraction, being one with Christ, were included in the Abrahamic covenant, without any concern in the Mosaic law, or the Sinai-covenant. (Notes, 26—29. Rom. 4:9—17. Heb. 6:12—20.) Now this covenant confirmed with Abraham, in respect of Christ and his salvation; the law, which was not given till four hundred and thirty years after the calling of Abraham, could not disannul, that the promise should be rendered of none effect. (Marg. Ref. q—x. Notes, Gen. 15:11—16. Ex. 12:40.) For if the inheritance of heaven, (which was typified by that of Canaan,) had depended on the law, and men's personal obedience to it: it could not have been secured to believers by the promise given to Abraham; and the new conditions, added to his covenant, would virtually have disannulled it.

V. 19—22. If then the promises were "spoken to Abraham and his Seed," and to all believers in him without any dependence on the law; what purpose did the law answer? and why was it promulgated? To this inquiry the apostle answered, that "it was added" to the covenant with Abraham, and rendered subservient to the accomplishment of it, in various particulars previously to the coming of Christ, though it made no alteration as to the manner of a sinner's acceptance. The whole system served, "because of transgressions," to restrain the nation of Israel from universal idolatry and wickedness, and to preserve the worship of God among them, till the coming of Christ: the moral law was useful to convince men of sin, to show them their need of repentance, of mercy, and of a Saviour; the ceremonial law shadowed forth the way of acceptance and holiness; and believers were, in the worship thus instituted, enabled to maintain communion with God, by faith in the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, Rom. 5:20,21.) Thus it pleased God, that things should remain, till the coming of that "Seed of Abraham," to whom especially the promises had respect: and the law was promulgated, and formed into a national covenant, at mount Sinai, by the ministration of angels, and by the intervention of Moses as a typical Mediator. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, Ex. 19: 20:18—20. 24: Deut. 5:22—29. Acts 7:34—36. Heb. 2:1—4.) It was, however, well known, that "a Mediator" was not appointed to act merely in behalf of one party in any covenant, but of two at least: yet only one party in the Abrahamic covenant, was present when the law was given; even God himself. For the nation of Israel was not the other contracting party in that covenant; unbelievers among them had no share in the principal blessings of it; and all believers in every age and nation were concerned in it, by virtue of their union with "the Seed," to whom the promise was made. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Note, 26—29.) Moses might indeed mediate a covenant between God and Israel: but he was not authorized to alter or disannul the Abrahamic covenant, which therefore continued in force with all believers, after the giving of the law, exactly as before. (Notes, Ex. 19:3. 20:1.)—This does not imply, that Christ was not present, as JEHOVAH, and the great Agent in the giving of the law: but only that he acted in his mediatorial character, and not in his mediatorial character, or as representing the whole body of believers.—If this then were the case, it might further be inquired, whether "the law was contrary to the promises of God," and the accomplishment of them, to those who lived under that dispensation. To this the apostle answered, "God forbid!" 'Let that thought be rejected with abhorrence.' The Sinai-covenant was distinct from the Abrahamic: the moral law, as the standard of duty, was distinct from the gospel, the foundation of a sinner's hope; and the shadows of the ceremonies, from Christ the Substance: but they were not contrary to each other. Nay, the law in every sense was subservient to the promises, and the performance of them to believers: it was good in itself and for the ends purposed by it; but it was never intended to "give life" to men; because all have broken it, and are prone to break it. For "if such a law had been given, as could have given life, verily righteousness," or justification unto life, "would have been by the law;" and the whole plan of redemption by Christ would have been superfluous. But whether the Mosaic dispensation, as unconnected with the gospel; or the moral precepts and sanctions; or any other part of the Old Testament, was duly attended to; its uniform tenor "concluded," or shut up, all men, of every nation or character, "under sin;" under the guilt of their actual transgressions, and the power of their evil propensities as in a strong prison, from which no law could give them deliverance. Yet even this was intended to recommend the gospel, that the promise of pardon, righteousness, liberty, grace, and eternal life, by faith in the promised Saviour, being proposed to men, when "shut up," as condemned criminals in prison, without hope or possibility of escape, might be freely performed to all who by faith acceded to the proposal; while all others must be left under the condemnation and the power of sin, without remedy. V. 23—25. Before the great Object and Author of "faith" was come, and the doctrine of "faith" fully declared, the nation of Israel, the visible church, was kept under the legal dispensation: and, not only were unbelievers shut up under the curse of the law, as at other times; but even believers were held in a state of comparative darkness and discipline. Through the promises and ceremonies, they received a measure of light and encouragement: and thus they looked forward to that brighter day which was predicted: while the nation at large was "shut up," by the institutions and sanctions of the law, and so restrained from total apostacy, till the coming of Christ and the full revelation of the doctrine of faith. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, Heb. 11:39,40. 1 John 2:7—11.) So that the church, considered as a complex body, was in a state of pupilage and minority under the old dispensation; and the law served as a "schoolmaster," or tutor, to instruct it in the introductory lessons of religious knowledge, by many hard tasks and burdensome restraints, imposed with much salutary severity. This was so ordered, that Christ and his salvation might be the more welcome; and that the very yoke of the law might bring men to him, "that they might be justified by faith." But when the great Object and doctrine of faith were publicly introduced, the church was no longer to continue under a schoolmaster; but was to be admitted to a nobler liberty, and instructed in a more open and enlarged manner. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 4:1—7. Matt. 11:28—30. Acts 15:7—11, v. 10.) As therefore, children are glad to be released from the confinement and discipline of a school; so believers should welcome the liberty and privileges of the gospel: and it was peculiarly absurd for Christians to be attached to the state of confinement, under which the ancient church had been held; and under the yoke of the legal dispensation.—This admits of an obvious accommodation to the believer's experience, and the first use of the moral law in bringing men to Christ: but the above is the evident scope of the apostle's argument.—'God also fully pardoned the sins of the upright Jews, and freed them from the punishments of the other life; but not by virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, . . . but by virtue of their faith in the Messiah, owned by them to be the Messiah their Righteousness.' Whitby.

V. 26—29. Even the Gentile converts were made at once "the children of God, by faith in Jesus Christ," and admitted to the full privilege of that high relation, by union with him, and an interest in his atonement and righteousness. For "as many of them as had been baptized" according to Christ's appointment, and thus admitted into his church, if indeed they were what that profession implied, had "put on Christ," as their robe of righteousness. (Marg. Ref. y—a.) It is generally supposed, that the apostle alludes to the custom of baptized persons putting off their old garments; and putting on new, clean, or white raiment, after they had been baptized: but it is by no means certain that this custom prevailed at so early a period; at least the sacred writers do not mention it. Indeed, the connexion of the twenty-seventh verse, with that which precedes, shows, that "the faith in Christ," which was publicly professed in baptism, and not the mere outward administration, (whether the baptized person had faith or not,) was especially intended.—'God now looking on them, there appears nothing but Christ; they are, as it were, covered all over with him, as a man is with the clothes that he hath put on; and hence in the next verse it is said, they are all one in Christ Jesus, as if there were but that one person.' Locke. The learned writer indeed connects this high privilege with the profession of the gospel; but certainly it cannot belong to a hypocritical profession.—'The false apostles might urge, that circumcision was used even from Abraham: but the apostle answers, that baptism has succeeded to circumcision.' Beza.—'Baptism under the gospel, as the rite of initiation, is as effectual for making us the sons of God, as circumcision was under the law.' Macknight. We may also add, 'And no more effectual.' (Notes, Rom. 2:25—29. 6:3,4. 1 Cor. 12:12—14. Col. 2:11,12. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) From the time when any persons "believe in their hearts unto righteousness, and with their mouths make confession to salvation," all other distinctions vanish: they are all members of the mystical body of Christ, and entitled to all its blessings, without any need of the Mosaic law. If then the Galatians did indeed belong to Christ, by faith, and the participation of his Spirit; they were become the spiritual seed of Abraham, and heirs of all the blessings covenanted to him; and had therefore no need of being proselyted to the Jewish law, or concerned in the abrogated Sinai-covenant.—The question, concerning the baptism of infants, is not at all affected by the apostle's language in this passage: for the same way of arguing, by which some have attempted to prove that they ought not to be baptized, because incapable of believing, would also prove them incapable of salvation; (Note, Mark 16:14—16.) and also prove, that the male infants of Israel ought not to have been circumcised.—The mention of "male and female," in this connexion, and here alone, evidently refers to the difference between circumcision, as restricted to the males, and baptism which is administered to females also. (Marg. Ref. b—g. Notes, 1 Cor. 7:10—14. Col. 3:7—11.)—'Slaves are now the Lord's freemen, and freemen the Lord's servants: and this consideration makes the free humble, and the slave cheerful.' Doddridge. (Note, 1 Cor. 7:17—24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The faithful preaching of the gospel so exhibits "Christ crucified," as the great Object of the Christian's faith, hope, and admiring love and gratitude; and so shows the nature, glory, and efficacy of his sufferings, from love to our souls; that he is, as it were, "evidently set forth before men's eyes," as dying upon the cross for their sins. But how very small a portion of the preaching in Christendom answers this description; or tends thus to excite men's affections towards the gracious Redeemer, needs not be told. Alas! who has infatuated and bewitched men's minds, that they should so generally turn away from this fundamental doctrine, to listen to metaphysical subtleties, fabulous and absurd legends, moral harangues, superstitious observances and forms, or enthusiastical reveries? It is plain, that "the god of this world," by various instruments, who reciprocally despise each other, has "blinded men's eyes, lest the gospel of the glory of Christ should shine into them," and lest they should learn to trust in a crucified Saviour, "God manifested in the flesh." (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 Tim. 3:16.) But we must observe, with great equal and astonishment, the folly of numbers, who have often heard the gospel most faithfully and pathetically preached; and yet have at length been fascinated by plausible deceivers, to refuse obedience to the truth. We cannot indeed appeal to miracles, and extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit: but we may boldly demand, Where are "the fruits of the Spirit" most evidently brought forth? among those who preach justification by the works of the law, or those who preach the doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour?—They who have begun to fear God, to seek mercy, to pray, and to renounce sin, under the preaching of the gospel; must be foolish indeed, if they think to make further proficiency by returning to legal dependences, or resting on external observances. It is most grievous to see those who have gone through sharp convictions, and even endured persecutions, for attending on the gospel, afterwards turning aside, and giving cause to fear that they have "suffered so many things in vain." Indeed any affliction endured, without profit derived from it, should be considered as a cause for sorrow and humiliation; and if the Lord loveth us, we may be assured, that further and sharper chastisements will follow.

V. 6—14. We should aim in every good thing to be "followers of those, who through faith and patience inherit the promises," and have "obtained a good report:" and for this end, we ought to study the Object, nature, and effects, of Abraham's faith. (Notes, Gen. 22:1—10. P. O. 1—12. Notes, Rom. 4: Heb. 6:13—15. 11:8—19. Jam. 2:21—24.) Those who partake of his faith shall surely inherit his blessing; and if we can ascertain that is our case, we may be sure of sharing all its privileges. But who can, in any other way, escape the curse of the holy law? Who has "continued in all things written in the book of the law to do them?" Who will venture to demand life on this ground? Let us learn to distinguish accurately in this matter. "The law is not of faith:" every law of God, and every legal covenant, must be perfectly distinct from "the covenant of promise," through faith in Jesus Christ: and if we confound these things, we shall find a curse instead of a blessing. The redemption of all, who ever were or shall be saved, was paid by the great Surety of the new covenant, when he was "made a curse for us," and "bare our sins in his own body on the tree:" but the sufferings of this "holy One of God" more loudly warn sinners to "flee from the wrath to come," than all the terrors of Sinai, or the curses of the law itself: for how can it be expected, that "God will spare" any man to whom sin is imputed, seeing "he spared not his own Son," when our sins were imputed to him? (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8. 8:32—34, v. 32. 2 Cor. 5: 18—21.) Yet at the same time Christ, as from the cross, and from the throne of glory, most graciously beseeches sinners to take refuge in him; and with accents of the tenderest love invites even the Gentiles, to accept of the blessing of Abraham, and to seek for the promise of the sanctifying and comforting Spirit, the earnest of our inheritance, by faith in him.

V. 15—22. No subsequent transactions, or external alterations, can "disannual or add to that covenant," which engages eternal life to every believer: that "promise cannot be made of none effect." Yet let us not think that the law was given in vain. The Sinai-covenant and the ceremonies of the law have answered their end, and, being fulfilled in Christ, are no more in force: yet are they still replete with instruction to believers; though a better covenant is made with them through that great Mediator, whom "all the angels of God worship." But, as the law of Moses was never contrary to the promises of God, to Abraham and his Seed; but served as a "a schoolmaster," to bring the church to Christ for justification by faith: so it would be most absurd to suppose, that the holy, just, and good law of God, the universal standard of duty, is contrary to the gospel of Christ; as it is in every way subservient to it, when properly understood and used. If a law was ever given to fallen man which could give eternal life, this must be it; and "then righteousness is by the law, and Christ died in vain:" but instead of this, the law brings in the whole world "guilty before God," and shuts up every man under sin, without hope or remedy from any other quarter than the gospel; while the excellency of its precepts demonstrates the justice of the sinner's condemnation. In this wretched condition Christ finds us all as transgressors, and the promise of eternal life is freely given by him to all that believe, but to them exclusively. (Notes, Rom. 3:19—26.)

V. 23—29. Men in general, even under the gospel, continue shut up as in a dungeon, as loving their chains; being blinded, intoxicated, and lulled asleep by Satan, through worldly pleasures, interests, and pursuits. But the awakened sinner discovers his dreadful condition. The more he exa-

CHAPTER IV.

The ancient church had been under the law, as a young heir under a guardian, 1—3. Christ came to "redeem those that were under the law," and to give believers, both Jews and Gentiles, "the adoption of sons," 4—7. The apostle shows how absurd the conduct of the Galatians was; in that, after having been delivered from idolatry by the gospel, they willingly subjected themselves to the bondage of the law: and he expresses his double concern concerning them, 8—11. He tenderly expostulates with them, for becoming alienated from him, to whom they had expressed the most fervent love; ascribes this to the influence of false teachers; and shows the ardour of his soul in longing for their salvation, 12—20. He illustrates the subject of the two covenants, by showing, that the history of Sarah and Isaac with Hagar and Ishmael was an allegorical representation of them, 21—31.

NOW I say, That [a]the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all;

2 But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father.

3 Even so we, [b]when we were children, were [c]in bondage under the [d]elements of the world:

4 But when [e]the fulness of the time was come, [f]God sent forth his Son, [g]made [h]of a woman, [h]made under the law,

5 To [i]redeem them that were under the law, [k]that we might receive the adoption of sons.

6 And because ye are sons, [l]God hath sent forth [m]the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, [n]crying, Abba, Father.

7 Wherefore [o]thou art no more a servant, [p]but a son; and [q]if a son, then an [r]heir of God through Christ.

8 Howbeit, then [s]when ye knew not God, [t]ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods.

9 But now, after that [u]ye have known God, or rather [x]are known of God, [y]how turn ye [t]again to the weak and beggarly [t]elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?

10 Ye [z]observe days, and months, and times, and years.

11 I [a]am afraid of you, [b]lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain. [Practical Observations.]

mines, or labours to escape, the fuller conviction he receives that he cannot effect his own deliverance: then he learns, that the mercy and grace of God form his only hope; and, though his doctrinal knowledge may be scanty, he is "shut up to the faith, that will shortly be revealed" to him. (Note, Eph. 5:8—14, v. 14.) The precepts and sanction of the law urge him on to duty, and restrain him from sin; even while they discourage him and fill him with terrors: and thus, by a kind and beneficial severity, the law is made use of by the convincing Spirit, to show him his need of Christ, and to bring him to rely on his righteousness, propitiation, and mediation, "that he may be justified by faith." Then he ceases to be under the tuition of the law, as "a schoolmaster," and to be alarmed by its terrors, except as he lives beneath his privileges: yet the precept becomes, by the teaching of the Spirit of Christ, his guide in the delightful path of evangelical obedience, his beloved rule of duty, and his standard of daily self-examination. In this use of it he learns continually to depend more simply on the Saviour; and it puts energy into his prayers, and endears the promises to his soul. Thus sinners "become the children of God by faith in Christ," and, being "baptized into him," by the converting grace of the Holy Spirit, they put on Christ and stand accepted in him; and all, who thus belong to him, and are one with him, are "the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise." (Notes, Rom. 4:9—17. 11:16—21.) But no outward forms or profession can ensure these blessings; for "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." (Note, Rom. 8:5—9.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The argument and illustration of the preceding chapter are here continued. (Note, 3:26—29.) The heir of an estate, during his minority, is excluded from the possession of it; and even kept in subjection to guardians and tutors, who lay restraints upon him as if he was a servant; though in fact he is the proprietor of the whole inheritance. And this continues till the time "appointed by his father," in his will or otherwise, for his coming of age, and being put in possession of the estate. (Marg. Ref. a.) Thus the church was held in a degree of bondage under the Mosaic law, till the coming of Christ; as being in its childhood, and under tuition. These observances are called "the elements of this world." They taught the simplest rudiments of religious knowledge, as the alphabet contains the first principles of science; (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. 6:1—3.) and the external ceremonies of that dispensation were suited to the ideas of worldly men, and in many things similar to the rites of other nations; rather than the most suitable means of spiritual worship, or adapted to those who were matured in spiritual judgment and affections. The splendid temple, the priests in their sacred vestments, the multiplied sacrifices and religious festivals, and other things of the same kind: when their typical meaning and use were undiscerned or neglected, were coincident with the gross apprehensions of carnal men concerning God and his worship. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 8—11. John 4:21—24. Col. 2:8,9,16—23. Heb. 7:11—17.) Unbelievers had always thus perverted them; and even believers were held in comparative darkness and bondage, by so many external observances.

V. 4—7. "When the fulness of the time" was arrived for the coming of the Messiah, which God had purposed in himself, and made known by prophecy; and which the state of the Jewish nation, and of mankind in general, showed to be peculiarly suitable for the introduction of a new and more enlarged dispensation: then God "sent forth his own Son," One with him in the divine nature, to become "manifest in the flesh;" assuming human nature into personal unity with the Deity, by his miraculous conception in the womb of the virgin, that he might be made, or born, (as some copies read it,) of a woman, and be emphatically her seed, by receiving his human flesh of her substance. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Is. 7:14. Jer. 31:21,22. John 1:18. 3:16.) 'He was therefore the Son of God, even, yea, properly, in respect of his Deity.' Beza. Thus he was also "made under the law," being born of a Jewess, and the reputed Son of a Jew, and circumcised: that so, being "under the law," as a covenant of works, he might, as the Surety of the church, in every way answer its full demand. (Marg. Ref. y.) This was done voluntarily, without any previous obligation. As "the Son of God," he was not subject to any law; as a perfectly holy man, he was not bound to submit to the ceremonial law, which in every thing implied man's sinfulness. But he was pleased, for between thirty and forty years, to tabernacle here on earth, in perfect obedience to the whole law: and at length to give himself, a spotless sacrifice of infinite value, "to redeem those who were under the law," and its righteous curse or condemnation, from that awful curse; (Note, 3:10—14.) and likewise to redeem the church from the ceremonial law; which was a kind of bond given for future payment by the Surety, of the debt due to divine justice for the sins of those who had obtained forgiveness by faith in the promised Saviour. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Rom. 3:21—26. Eph. 2:14—18. Col. 2:13—15.) Thus instead of the yoke of ceremonial obedience, and that slavish spirit which in many cases it inspired; believers received and possessed "the adoption of children;" and had the liberty and privileges of adults, instead of the restraints and rigorous subjection of minors. And, because this was the state of the Gentile as well as the Jewish converts, "God had sent forth" the Holy Spirit, given through his Son, to quicken, seal, and comfort them, as his beloved children; enabling and encouraging them, with filial love and confidence, to call upon him as their Father, to whatever nation they belonged. Seeing therefore the apostle hoped that this was the case of the Galatians in general, though there might be exceptions, (for he addressed them individually,) every person of this character, of whatever country or language, was no longer "a servant," to worship and obey God from slavish fear or mercenary hope; "but a son," and an heir of heaven through Christ, to walk with him in love, filial reverence, and confidence. (Notes, Rom. 8:14—17.)

even Jewish converts were redeemed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, as well as from the curse of the covenant of works. How absurd then would it be, for Gentiles to adopt that abrogated system! The Galatians had formerly been ignorant of "the one living and true God," and had then performed religious service to mere creatures, or imaginary beings, "which by nature are not gods;" and mere external observances might well accord to such objects of worship. But, having at length been brought to the knowledge of God, by their conversion to Christianity; or rather having been thus "known" and owned by him, by their admission into the Christian church, and the spiritual gifts bestowed on them; could they think of turning again to carnal services, similar to those which they had forsaken, as if desirous of being in bondage to them? (Marg. Ref. s—z. Notes, 1 Cor. 8:4—6. 12:1—3.) The ceremonies of the Mosaic law were mere "rudiments" of religious knowledge, suited to the childhood of the church: they were, in themselves, weak and inefficacious, low and "poor;" and thus incapable of communicating spiritual riches to mankind: and after the coming of the Messiah, having lost all their use and obligation, they became as worthless even as the superstitions of Paganism; so that when put in the place of Christ, they were equally inconsistent with true religion. (Note, 1—3.) In this sense alone could the Galatians be said "to turn again to the weak and beggarly elements;" for they had not before been under the ceremonial law: but, when delivered from idolatry, they were about to substitute the abrograted ceremonial law in the place of the heathen superstitions; and to bring themselves into bondage to Judaizing teachers and pharisaical traditions, after having been emancipated from the Pagan priests. Their observation of the sabbaths, new moons, festivals, and sabbatical years, as prescribed in the law, had the appearance of apostacy to Judaism; so that the apostle was afraid that they would totally depart from the faith, and that his labours for their eternal salvation would be in vain.—Ye knew not God. (8) Notes, 1 Chr. 22:6—10, v. 9. John 8:54—59. 17:1—3. Acts 17:22—25. Rom. 1:18—32. 1 Cor. 1:20—24. Eph. 2:11—13. Beggarly, &c. (9) 'Thus he calls these rites in themselves, and considered apart from Christ.' Beza. 'St. Paul calls them "weak and beggarly elements," whereby it should seem they were empty of all spiritual meaning. I answer, such they were become indeed, when Christ was once come; ... when the grace signified in them was brought out into the light, when the inwrapped promises were unfolded and revealed; they were then as empty shells, and like carcasses whose soul was gone. So long as a shell contains a kernel unseen, so long it is full; when it comes forth to outward view, then the shell is empty. Even so it is with the elements of the law.' Mede.—The best illustration of the absurd conduct, which the apostle ascribes to the Galatians, may be found in the church of Rome, in which the worship of saints and angels succeeded to that of the inferior deities; the superstitious and often licentious festivals multiplied among them, to those which had been used in Pagan Rome. In short, almost every part of the idolatrous worship of Pagan Rome has its counterpart in that of Antichristian Rome: this may be clearly perceived by any man, who will take the pains to compare many passages in Virgil, and other Latin and Greek poets, with the rituals of the church of Rome.

V. 12—16. 'The apostle tempers whatever he might seem to have said more sharply than usual, by an admirable, and therefore no doubt a divine management: so declaring his good will to the Galatians; that when they read it, unless they were wholly desperate, they could not but acknowledge his lenity with tears.' Beza.—Being desirous of considering the Galatians as his brethren in Christ, he affectionately entreated them to "be as he was;" as cordial in their love to him, as he was in his love to them; or rather, of one mind with him, respecting justification and the Mosaic law: for "he was as they were;" though he had been "zealous for the law;" (as they were now become!) yet he now trusted only in Christ; and put no more confidence in the law, than if he had been a Gentile: and he entreated them in this to imitate him. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 2:11—16. 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) He did not charge them with having at all "injured him," or speak any thing out of resentment; though they had wronged themselves in departing from his doctrine. They remembered his first coming among them; when his bodily infirmities seemed to unfit him for preaching the gospel, or likely to render his ministry unacceptable; yet he was enabled to proceed, though greatly tried and tempted and discouraged. (Marg. Ref. vl—f. Note, 1 Cor. 2:3—5.) They had not, however, despised him on that account, or rejected his testimony: but, seeing that his doctrine was confirmed by undeniable proofs, and feeling its energy on their hearts and consciences, they received him, though thus infirm and tempted, even as if he had been an angel sent from God, or as if Christ himself had come in person to preach to them. Doubtless the apostle here spake of "his thorn in the flesh;" which must therefore have been some perceivable infirmity, that exposed him to inward temptations, and to the contempt of his enemies: and indeed it is absurd to explain this of his persecutions, which were no plausible reason why he should be despised, but the contrary. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.)—"Where was then the felicity" of which they spake, as communicated by the hope and comforts of the gospel? What was the nature of it? What must now have become of that "blessedness," that they should after all have recourse to the legal covenant, which could only enslave and condemn them? Their inward satisfaction and consolation in Christ had formerly so inspired them with love to his minister, that the apostle bare them testimony, that they were "willing even to pluck out their eyes, and to give them to him;" if this could possibly have removed his infirmities, or conduced to his benefit. (Marg. Ref. l—m.) And was he so soon become their enemy? the object of their aversion and resentment? If so, it must be because he had persisted in telling them the truth, both in respect to the way of salvation, and of their perilous deviation from it.

V. 17—20. The Judaizing teachers paid very great attention to the Galatians, and professed the most zealous affection for them: but this did not arise from proper principles, nor was it expressed in a proper manner. (Notes, 5:19—21. Rom. 10:1—4. Jam. 3:13—16.) Yea, they would even "exclude them," from the liberty and salvation of Christ, in order to confirm them in a blind attachment to their own doctrine and party. Some copies read, "they would exclude us:" they wanted to alienate the Christians in Galatia from the apostle, that they might possess an undivided authority over them from carnal motives. But instead of showing so zealous an attachment to these deceivers, who had supplanted the apostle in their affections; it would be good for the Galatians to be constantly "zealous in a good thing," even for the truth and cause of pure Christianity; and not only while he continued among them, as had been the case with many of them. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Note, Phil. 2:12,13.)—He must, however, consider them as "his dear children," though in a state of infantine weakness: (Note, 1 Cor. 4:14—17.) and as he had laboured and suffered greatly in earnestly seeking their conversion from idolatry; so he might be 21 Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?

22 For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman.

23 But he who was of the bondwoman was, born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise.

24 Which things are an allegory: for these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar.

25 For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children.

26 But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all.

27 For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath a husband.

28 Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise.

29 But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now.

30 Nevertheless, what saith the Scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free.

said "a second time to travail in birth" for them. (Note, Is. 53:11,12.) He was as earnest for their recovery from their present delusion, as he had been for their conversion from idolatry. His heart was even filled with anguish from his anxiety about them; and he suffered pangs, like those of a travailing woman, which seemed as if they must continue, till "Christ was formed in them," in proof that they had "put on Christ" as their robe of righteousness: for their legal observances were no more like the genuine holiness and obedience of true believers, than their legal dependence resembled "the faith of God's elect." (Marg. Ref. s—u.) He therefore longed to be with them, that he might witness this happy change; and that he might alter his words of reproof, for those of encouragement and commendation; or change his voice, as different circumstances and characters should require, which could not so well be done in an epistle. For he stood in "doubt of them," or hesitated, as to what he ought to think of them, whether they had been truly converted, or not; and he was anxious to know what the event of their present delusions would be. V. 21—31. Many of the Galatians absurdly desiring "to be under the law" of Moses, from a mistaken interpretation of the Old Testament; the apostle demanded, whether they did not observe what was "written in the law," or in the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, John 10:32—39. 12:34—36. 15:22—25. Rom. 3:19,20.) For the history of Abraham contained an apt emblem of the two covenants. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13.) Ishmael was born of Hagar, in the ordinary course of nature, and in consequence of a carnal project: (Notes, Gen. 16:) but Isaac was born of Sarah, a freewoman, the wife of Abraham, by the miraculous performance of God's promise, when she was naturally past child-bearing. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Notes, Gen. 17:15—21. 18:9—15. 21:1—7. Rom. 4:15—22.) These things were an allegory of the Sinai-covenant; and of that made with Abraham in Christ for the benefit of all believers. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 3:15—22.) All those Israelites, who were not by faith interested in the covenant made with Abraham, were indeed outwardly a part of Abraham's family, and of the visible church: but like Ishmael, they were born in servitude, all their obedience was of a slavish nature, and their privileges were external and temporal: nor could the Sinai-covenant deliver them from this state. For "Hagar, the bondwoman," was the emblem of mount Sinai, in the deserts bordering on Arabia, which country was afterwards peopled by her descendants, being without the boundaries of the promised land. From that mountain the law was given, and there the legal covenant was ratified. It therefore corresponded to Jerusalem and its inhabitants, as the outward worshippers of God, in the ordinances performed at the temple. For, as far as they continued under the Sinai-covenant, especially when they had rejected Christ and the gospel, they were mere slaves, influenced by the "spirit of bondage," and not the children of God. (Marg. Ref. f—n. Notes, 8—11. Rom. 8:14—17.) But "the heavenly Jerusalem," the true church as coming from above, espoused to Christ, and represented by Sarah, is in a state of freedom; and this church is the mother of all true believers, who are "born of the Spirit." (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, Heb. 12: 22—25. Rev. 21:1—4,9—27.) That this church should mainly consist of Gentile converts, had long before been figuratively predicted. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Note, Is. 54:1.)—Believers, therefore, whether Jews or Gentiles, like Isaac, were "the children of promise:" (Note, Rom. 9:6—9.) they were not only brought into the church, as descended from Abraham, or proselyted to an external profession: but they were by regeneration, and through faith, made a part of the true seed of Abraham, in virtue of the promise made to him, that "in his Seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed." (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 3:26—29. Rom. 4:9—17.) But, as Ishmael, a slave on his mother's side by birth, and in no wise entitled to the inheritance, had mocked and persecuted Isaac, who was miraculously born of Sarah according to the promise, to be Abraham's heir: so the Jews, who continued voluntarily in bondage under the legal covenant, at that time persecuted the Christians, who were "born after the Spirit," as Abraham's seed, according to the true meaning of the sacred oracles, and to whom alone true liberty and the heavenly inheritance belonged. But, as the Galatians might read in the Scripture, that God himself had commanded Hagar and Ishmael to be sent away from Abraham's family, that "the son of the bondwoman" might not share the inheritance with Isaac; even so the Jewish nation would soon be cast out of the church, and all who continued under the legal covenant would be excluded from heaven. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Gen. 21:8—13.) If then the exclusive privileges of all believers were immensely superior, according to the new covenant; what an absurdity was it for the Gentile converts to "desire to be under the law," which could not deliver the unbelieving Jews either from bondage or condemnation!—We should not perhaps have discovered this allegory, in the history of Sarah and Hagar, if the apostle had not shown it to us; and much sobriety and discretion ought to be used in thus applying scriptural narrations: yet this transaction was so remarkable, the coincidence so exact, and the illustration so instructive, that we cannot doubt it originally was intended by the Holy Spirit, as an allegory and type of those things, to which the inspired apostle referred it: and it should be observed, that it was adduced, as an illustration of the subject under consideration, and not as a direct argument or proof of it.—Rejoice thou barren, &c. (27) From the LXX, which accord to the Hebrew. (Is. 54:1.)—Cast out, &c. (30) This varies in things not material to the sense, both from the LXX, and from the Hebrew. (Gen. 21:10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. While we are, or ought to be, thankful for deliverance from "the elements of this world," by the light, liberty, and privileges of the gospel; we should cheerfully submit to the restraints and corrections of our heavenly Father, in this our state of education for perfect felicity; and patiently wait the time appointed by him for our admission to it: and we ought to delight in the "easy yoke" of our Redeemer, whose 'service is perfect freedom.' (Note, Matt. 11:28—30.) For who can enough admire the condescending compassion of the Son of God, in "being born of a woman, and made under the law," that, by obedience unto the death upon the cross, he might redeem us wretched rebels from every fatal curse, galling yoke, and slavish terror, that so we might

CHAPTER V.

The apostle exhorts the Galatians to stand fast in their Christian liberty; and shows that, by being circumcised they would in fact renounce Christ; as in him "nothing availeth but faith which worketh by love," 1—6. He disclaims the preaching of circumcision himself, and condemns it in others, 7—12. He cautions them not to abuse their liberty, but "by love to serve one another;" for "love is the fulfilling of the law," 13—15. Exhorting them "to walk in the Spirit," he states the conflict between the flesh and the spirit, 16—18. He enumerates the works of the flesh, and the fruits of the Spirit, 19—23. He shows that true Christians have "crucified the flesh;" again calls on the Galatians to walk in the Spirit; and warns them against vainglory and envy, 24—26.

[a]STAND fast therefore in [b]the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not [c]entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

2 Behold, [d]I Paul say unto you, [e]that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.

3 For I [f]testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is [g]a debtor to do the whole law.

4 Christ [h]is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are [i]justified by the law; [k]ye are fallen from grace.

5 For we [l]through the Spirit [m]wait for [n]the hope of righteousness by faith.

6 For [o]in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but [p]faith which worketh by love.

"receive the adoption of children;" and "the Spirit of adoption," emboldening us to worship God as our Father, to walk with him in holy communion, and to rejoice in the hope of his everlasting felicity? May we, by this filial temper and conduct, at all times evince our adoption; and may "the Holy Spirit thus witness with our Spirit, that we are the children and heirs of God!"—Once "we knew not God:" and though outward circumstances kept most of us from gross idolatry; yet we idolized the world, and sought our happiness from it. If then we now so "know God" in Christ, as to reverence, love, trust, and obey him; it is the effect of his knowledge of us, as the objects of his choice, and owning us as ransomed by the blood of his Son. (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 2 Tim. 2:19.) What then have we to do any more with worldly idols? What occasion for superstitious and human inventions, as if we desired to be still in bondage? Surely all those things must be "weak and beggarly elements," which God has no where required of us! (Notes, Col. 2:8—23.) And though Christians may "observe a day to the Lord;" yet an evident and zealous attachment to things of this nature, may well induce a fear concerning men's spiritual state: (Note, Rom. 14:5,6.) and it should always be remembered, that if ministers lose their faithful labours, their hearers lose their precious souls. Idolatry consists in "worshipping what by nature is no God:" surely then the worship of saints and angels is turning again to heathenism; and every scriptural example of worship rendered to Christ, demonstrates that he is, "by nature," "God over all, blessed for evermore."

V. 12—20. Ministers ought, as much as possible, to wave their personal complaints against their people; and to show more fear lest they should injure themselves, than lest they should behave amiss to them. It behooves us, when we think ourselves unkindly treated, to recollect the instances in which we experienced the candour and affection of our hearers; and when they overlooked those infirmities and defects, if not instances of misconduct, which we feared would have occasioned the rejection of our message. We may also remind them, when they seem about to turn aside, of those tender and sweet seasons, when they welcomed the gospel as preached by such poor worms, as if an angel, or "even Christ himself," had spoken to them; and when their hearts were so full of "blessedness," that they scarcely knew how sufficiently to express their gratitude, even to the instruments of their hopes and consolations. Contrasting these happy seasons with that coldness and disaffection which too frequently follow without any apparent reason; we may with efficacy inquire, "what is become of their blessedness;" and whether we be looked on as enemies, because we tell them the truth. Alas! this is often the case, not only with false professors of the gospel, but even with misguided believers; when for a time they are seduced by those who "zealously affect them, but not well;" who would alienate them from their faithful pastors, to attach them to themselves; or who would even disregard their souls, and their eternal salvation, to promote their own credit, or that of their party. At such times, the most affectionate warnings and scriptural arguments generally give offence, and increase alienation. This is a most trying situation to the faithful minister. He cannot cease to feel for his deluded children, and to long after them. Though he could bear to lose their affections, he cannot be willing that they should lose their souls: he must remind them that their zealous affections should be towards more substantial good, than new notions and new teachers; as in the sight of God, and not merely in the presence of their ministers. Thus many know experimentally something of the apostle's meaning when he said, "that he travailed in birth again," of his spiritual children, till "Christ was formed in them;" as the anguish on account of those whom they had hoped were converted, is greater than their earnestness for their conversion; and their prayers and endeavours are more fervent, as fearing "lest their last state should be worse than the first." (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. 2 Pet. 2:20—22)—Nothing is so sure a proof of a sinner's justification, as "Christ formed in him" by the renewal of the Holy Spirit: but this cannot be hoped for, while men depend on the law for acceptance with God. (Notes, Rom. 6:14,15. 7:1—6. 2 Cor. 13:5,6.) The faithful minister "desires to change his voice" of reproof, for that of commendation; and not only to instruct, but to speak confidently of those, concerning whom he stands in doubt; and who, therefore, certainly ought to stand in doubt of themselves.

V. 21—31. Those "who desire to be under the law," should hear what the law says to them: and this would in every case teach them to flee from it, to the grace of the gospel. For not only do allegories and types instruct us; but the plainest language imaginable declares the two covenants, that from Sinai and that of Christ, to be perfectly distinct, and even of opposite tendency, to those who now are under them. They who are "born of the flesh," whether of Jewish or Christian parents, but not "of the Spirit:" (Notes, John 3:3—11.) and who in any degree depend for justification on circumcision, baptism, or any personal obedience whatsoever; or even on creeds, however scriptural; or on being members of this or the other church, however excellent, are under the covenant of works, mere Ishmaelites, bondslaves, citizens of the earthly Jerusalem, but under condemnation. But those who "are born of the Spirit," and so believe in Christ, trusting only in his merits and grace, are the "children of the promise," and of the heavenly Jerusalem; they possess true liberty, and are the heirs of everlasting felicity. Millions have already been thus "born of God," in the Gentile world, which once lay desolate: and we should pray, and do what we can in every way, that such places as still continue barren, (alas, how numerous and extensive!) may speedily produce far more converts, than have yet been made in the most flourishing churches: and especially, that Israel may speedily be gathered from his abject state, which shall be "as life from the dead" to the nations of the earth.—If indeed we are "the children of promise" and heirs of the inheritance; we need not wonder that carnal Ishmaels mock and persecute us: so it has been, and so it will be. But let us rest our souls on the Scripture, and, by an evangelical hope and a cheerfull obedience, let us show that we are the children of God, that we walk at liberty, and that our conversation and our treasure are indeed in heaven.

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—6. Christ had called the churches in Galatia, by his gospel, to partake of liberty from condemnation and from the ceremonial law, as well as from their former idolatries and slavery to sin and Satan: (Marg. Ref. a, b.) the apostle therefore exhorted them to "stand fast in that liberty," whatever efforts were used to deprive them of it; and not to suffer the Judaizing teachers to entangle them in a yoke of bondage under the ceremonial law; which would reduce them again into as abject a slavery, as that of their Gentile state. (Note, 4:8—11,21—31.) For he, Paul, though opposed to many confident teachers who maintained the contrary, most decidedly and solemnly assured them, that if they submitted to circumcision, as necessary to justification, they would derive no benefit from Christ and his covenant; or from his righteousness, atonement, and mediation and he again testified to every individual among them, who should be circumcised from such motives, that "he was become" a debtor to "keep the whole law," and liable to condemnation for every failure in his obedience to it. (Notes 1:6—10. 3:6—14.)—Perhaps some taught them, that the most burdensome parts of the law were not obligatory on proselytes, who lived at a distance from Jerusalem.—It was however most certain, that Christ would not benefit that man, who brought himself under this obligation, by seeking to be justified on account of his own obedience to the law: as that attempt was in fact a renunciation of the doctrine of grace, a forfeiture of every hope of benefit from the mercy and free favour of God, and a kind of voluntary divorcing himself from Christ, and laying hold of the legal covenant. (Marg. Ref. c—k.) For circumcision, in such circumstances, would be a deliberate renunciation of the covenant of grace: whereas all true Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, being taught by the Holy Spirit, "waited for eternal life," the proper reward of righteousness, and the object of their hope, as the gift of God by faith in Christ; and not for the sake of their own works in any degree. They not only sought to be, and hoped that they were pardoned and justified in respect of the past and present: but they had the same expectation of the future, and waited for the day of judgment, expecting to be accounted righteous, in Christ, by faith alone, by which they were not only brought into a justified state, but continued in it to the end; and thus entitled to the heavenly inheritance. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Rom. 5:1,2. 2 Cor. 5:5—8, v. 7. Jude 20,21.) For, according to the new covenant, and in respect of those who were members of the Christian church, "neither circumcision nor uncircumcision were of any avail;" the Jewish convert might observe the legal ceremonies, or he might assert his liberty from them; the Gentile might utterly disregard them, or from motives of expediency he might be circumcised as Timothy had been, and pay some attention to them; provided he did not count them obligatory on his conscience, or place any dependence on them. But these things were of no avail "in Christ Jesus." They could not profit an unbeliever; nor prevent the salvation of a believer; whatever purpose might in other respects be answered by either the one or the other. True faith alone received the Saviour, and interested the believer as one with Christ in his whole salvation: and this living and justifying faith was distinguished from a dead faith, by being an operative active principle; and especially as it always showed its energy in the heart, by love to Christ, his cause, and his people; by love to God, and to man for his sake: and this never failed to produce its correspondent effects on a person's conduct. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, 6:15,16. 1 Cor. 7:17—24, v. 19. Jam. 2:14—26. 1 John 5:1—5.) By this view of the subject, a simple dependence on the righteousness and atonement of Christ, and an evangelical obedience to his commandments, are at once secured: and the fruits of that love, by which "faith worketh," will be adduced at the day of judgment, as evidences to prove believers entitled to the heavenly inheritance. (Notes, Matt. 25: 34—46.) After what the apostle had before said, (2—4.) this conclusion fully proves, that he did not oppose the observance of the ceremonial law, as even in itself: but as their dependence on it was wholly incompatible with the method of justification revealed in the gospel.—'It is to be noted, that circumcision is here to be considered, partly from the circumstances of the times, (when it had ceased to be "the seal of the righteousness of faith," as by baptism it was abolished,) and partly from the sentiments of these adversaries, who were desirous to connect it with Christ, as if some part of salvation resided in it.' Beza. 'If the whole confidence of the soul do not rest on him for salvation; he will reject those divided regards which are offered to him, and interpret them as an affront, rather than an acceptable homage.' Doddridge. 'It is not easy to perceive, how they should have justification and salvation from him, from whom, after the revelation made of him, they did not expect it: nor have faith in him for justification, by whom they thought not that they should be justified.' Whitby.

V. 7—12. When the gospel had first been received by the Galatians, they seemed in a very promising manner to "run the race set before them;" professing and apparently exercising that "faith which worketh by love," and obeying Christ from evangelical principles. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27. 2 Tim. 4:6—8. Heb. 12:1.) But they were now evidently "hindered," and turned aside from this obedience of faith and love, to ceremonial observances and dependence on the law. But who had thus "driven them back" from the way of Christ, into these new and unauthorized paths? or, come across them in the course, and turned them out of it? "This persuasion" of the necessity of circumcision, certainly did not come from the apostle, who had "called them to the grace of Christ;" nor was it from the Holy Spirit, the Agent in the sinner's conversion. (Note, 1:6—10. 3:1—5.) In fact, a few Judaizers had crept in among them, who, being infected with pride, bigotry, and enmity against the pure gospel of Christ, had "leavened" them also with a similar spirit; its baleful influence was rapidly diffusing itself through all their churches, and would have most fatal effects, unless most decidedly counteracted. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Notes, Matt. 16:5—12. 1 Cor. 5:6—8. 15:31—34.) The apostle, however, reflecting on the manner in which they had received his doctrine, and trusting in the Lord Jesus, still had a confidence in them, that they would recover from the temporary fascination, and become entirely of his judgment on the subject. Then the ringleader of the defection, or any other person who had perverted them, (of whatever importance he had seemed to be,) would be justly censured by them, and bear that condemnation from them which he deserved; as assuredly he would from God, unless he were brought to repentance. (Marg. Ref. u—z.) Indeed, it had been craftily and maliciously insinuated, that the apostle himself after his journey to Jerusalem, and his conference with the other apostles, on some occasions preached the necessity of circumcision, when it conduced to increase his influence; and for this, his candid allowance to men's prejudices, when it could be safely done, and the circumcision of Timothy, might give the handle: but if this had been his practice, why did he every where meet with such furious persecution from the Jews? For in that case, the offence of the cross of Christ would have in a great measure ceased. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Had he proselyted the Gentiles to the Mosaic law, and taught justification by it; the Jews, the grand point in contest being thus conceded, would have connived at his regard to Jesus of Nazareth, being gratified in their self-preference, and in the increasing number of those who observed the law; but his preaching Christ as the whole salvation of sinners; his disregard to the ritual law; his doctrine of justification, which left all unbelievers under condemnation without distinction, and his success among the Gentiles, whom he would not allow to be circumcised, every where exasperated the Jews against him. As then this insinuation was notoriously false; so he ardently desired that the persons who thus troubled them, and employed such manifest deceits for that purpose, were cut off by excommunications from their society; and so kept from doing them any further mischief. But why did he not command the Galatians to excommunicate them, as he had required the Corinthians to deliver the incestuous person to Satan. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5:1—5,9—13. 2 Cor. 2:5—11.) It is probable, because the infection had spread so wide in the churches of Galatia, the persons to be censured possessed so great influence, and so very many were concerned in some degree, that there was little prospect, except by the intervention of miracles, that such a command would be obeyed. Their crime, likewise, however rumous to themselves and others, was of a more plausible nature than the scandalous conduct of the incestuous Corinthian.—It is also to be noted, that the apostle did not command the Corinthians to excommunicate the false teachers, though he most decidedly testified against them. (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) In both cases, having intimated their duty, he waited a more favourable opportunity of interposing his own authority.

Cutting off by excommunication is evidently meant; as a mortified limb is separated from the body, to stop the fatal progress of a gangrene. (Note, 2 Tim. 2:14—18.) This did not in itself imply any degree of persecution, or further punishment; though sometimes accompanied by miraculous judgments. V. 13—15. The Galatians had been "called unto liberty," and ought not to endure those who attempted to bring them into bondage: only let them be careful not to run into licentiousness, or to take "occasion from their liberty" to indulge the inclinations of corrupt nature. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Note, 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) "Faith working by love" would indeed, as far as it prevailed, lead them to serve and worship God as his children: and love to their brethren and to all men, for Christ's sake and after his example, ought to make them willing "servants to each other," and induce them to give up their own inclinations and indulgence, to promote the welfare of their brethren, as far as in their power; without doing any one harm, in his person, connexions, property, reputation, or peace of mind. (Notes, Ex. 20:13—17. Matt. 20:24—28. 1 Cor. 9: 19—23.) For the whole moral law contained no more, in all its requirements, than was implied in "love;" especially the whole of men's duty to one another was summed up in the single precept of "loving their neighbours as themselves:" (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, Lev. 19:18. Rom. 13:8—10.) and this still continued to be their rule of duty, though they were delivered from the law as a covenant. But if, on the contrary, they indulged selfishness, pride, and anger, by dividing into parties and quarrelling with each other, as if like wild beasts, they would "bite and devour one another;" they might expect to be left by the God of peace and love, to be the instruments of each other's present misery or future destruction. (Marg. Ref. k. Note, Jam. 3:13—16. 4:1—3.)—'The zeal of the Jews would not suffer an uncircumcised person to live among them; so might it be also with these zealous Judaizers.' Whitby.

V. 16—18. To prevent the ruinous consequences of contentions to themselves and others, and the disgrace which they brought on the gospel; the apostle called on the Galatians "to walk in the Spirit;" according to his holy guidance, in dependence on his influences, and with constant prayer for them. This would effectually prevent them from "fulfilling the lusts," or desires, of the flesh, or that evil nature with which they were born, as descended from fallen Adam. (Marg. Ref. i—n.)—'According to his manner, the apostle calls that part of a man "the spirit," which is newly quickened by the Holy Spirit, which is "dead unto sin, and alive unto God;"... and "the flesh," whatever in man is not renewed by grace, through Christ, as apprehended by faith. He here justly adds, that in the same regenerate man is both "flesh and spirit;" the conflict between which is copiously shown in the seventh chapter of the Romans'. Beza. "For the flesh," "the old man," "lusteth" in direct opposition to the desires of the new nature in the regenerate, as well as to the dictates of the Holy Spirit: and "the spirit," in both senses, opposes the corrupt desires of the flesh, by holy affections and inclinations. These are therefore placed in direct opposition to each other: so that believers "do not the things which they would," according to the most literal meaning of the words. They are not so holy as they long to be; nor yet, though at liberty from the covenant of works, do they indulge those corrupt inclinations, which still rise up in their hearts, and cause them much trouble, distress, and perplexity. Thus they are engaged in a perpetual conflict, in which they earnestly desire that grace may obtain a complete and speedy victory. And those who thus give themselves up "to be led by the Spirit," "are not under the law," nor exposed to its awful curse for every failure in obedience; while their hatred of sin and desires after holiness, according to the perfect rule of God's commandments, is the evidence that they are interested in the salvation of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. o—s. Notes, Rom. 7:7—25. 8:1—17.)—The apostle, in his epistle to the Romans, says, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Here he says, "If ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law." Hence it follows, that they who are "not under the law" are "the sons of God."—'Ye will not gratify the lusts of your animal nature; particularly ye will not gratify the sinful passions of envy, malice, anger, revenge.' Macknight.—Do 'envy, malice, anger, revenge,' belong to the animal nature? Is the devil, then, in this sense, an animal? In fact, all sin has its source and seat in the soul, and the body, even in gross sensual indulgences, is only "the instrument of unrighteousness to sin." (Notes, Matt. 15:15—20 Rom. 6:12,13,16—19.)

Walk in the Spirit. (16) Πνευματι περιπατειτε. 5,25.—As πνευματι is without the article, it properly signifies, as Beza explains it, that which "is born of the Spirit, and is spirit:" yet this does not alter the meaning of the exhortation, as when we are influenced by this new principle, we walk in dependence on the Holy Spirit, who both communicated it, preserves it, and works in and by it.—Are contrary. (17) Αντικειται. See on Luke 21:15.—Ye cannot do the things that ye would.] Μη ά αν θελητε, ταυτα ποιητε.—Ου γαρ ὁ θελω ποιω αγαθον, Rom. 7:19.

V. 19—21. The difference between "the flesh and the spirit" might be known by their contrary effects. (Notes, 16 —18. John 3:6.) "The works of the flesh" must be "manifest" to every one, who considered the conduct of unconverted men, and the state of the world in general. Several of the sins here specified, as "the works of the flesh," have no connexion with the bodily appetites; which proves, that we are not to understand, by "flesh and spirit," the animal part of man, as distinguished from the intellectual; but the whole of our fallen nature, as opposed to the new nature communicated by regeneration, and the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit acting upon it and by it. (Note, Rom. 8:5—9.) There can be no doubt about "adultery, fornication, &c." being in every sense "works of the flesh." (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 1 Cor. 6:18—20.)—Idolatry also is "a work of the flesh;" as it springs from man's carnal enmity to the holy character, worship, and service of God; in the stead of whom he deifies imaginary beings more congenial to himself, and worships them in a manner more suited to his pride and lusts. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Rom. 1:21—27.) "Witchcraft," (implying all kinds of sorcery, charms, divinations, incantations, fortunetelling, and attempted intercourse with evil spirits, real or pretended,) is "a work of the flesh," as it results from man's carnal dislike of submission to God, and dependence on him, and a desire of seeking help and information from other quarters: by both these, men virtually worship the devil. (Marg. Ref. x. Note, Ex. 22:18.) "Hatred and variance" are also "works of the flesh;" and "emulations" seem in this connexion to signify that ambition of pre-eminence and thirst for glory, which excite men to vie with one another, and eagerly to aspire after distinction, according to the nature of their objects and pursuits. Poets, orators, historians, philosophers, moralists, and all men who do not attend to the Bible, deem this the noblest principle of human activity; yet it springs from unmingled pride and selfishness, and is nearly allied to envy. When the object of emulation is evil, its effects are dreadful: when the object is good, the glory of man is sacrilegiously substituted, in the place of the glory of God; and this thirst for human applause has caused more horrible violations of the law of love, and done more to desolate the earth, than even the grossest sensuality ever did. (Ξηλοι, Note, Jam. 3:13—16.) Along with "strife and seditions," by which schisms in the church and factions in the state may be meant, "heresies" are called "works of the flesh." Pride, ambition, avarice, or other carnal affections, induce man to pervert the truth of God's words; and, espousing some pernicious error, to seek distinction by propagating it. Hence arise contentions, separations, and the most fatal effects to individuals and to the church. (Notes, 1 Cor. 11 17 —22. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) These were therefore joined by the apostle along with adulteries, and unnatural lusts, drunkenness, envy, revellings, seditions, and even murders, as equally the result of a carnal heart, and marks of unregeneracy. Many more he might have mentioned: for covetousness, and the sins connected with it, are elsewhere mentioned; (Note, 1 Cor. 6:9—11.) but these "and such like" would, without repentance and its fruits, certainly exclude men from "inheriting the kingdom of God;" as the apostle had formerly declared to them, and now again forewarned them. (Marg. Ref. z—c.)—The word translated "witchcrafts," is by some rendered poisonings; as if the apostle, in this compendium would pause to distinguish one kind of murder from another; when the difference did not at all alter the nature or degree of the crime! "Witchcrafts" had the name used in the original, from the magical compositions of certain ingredients, which attended these diabolical practices.—"Revellings" were such feasts, as were accompanied with music and dancing, and whatever could promote hilarity and sensual gratification. The Greeks and Romans had an imaginary god, called Comus, (from the Greek word here used,) who was supposed to preside over these feasts, and was in that character worshipped by hymns, oblations, and libations. (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:3—7. 1 Pet. 4:3—5.)—The word rendered "lasciviousness," (19) is used by Demosthenes, in describing the enormous ambition and rapacity of Philip, king of Macedon. It seems to denote the exorbitancy of any passion, which is left without restraint; though in Scripture it is generally used of unbridled sensual indulgence.

V. 22—26. The holy affections, and the conduct resulting from them, as here enumerated, are not called 'the works of a believer,' but "the fruit of the Spirit," dwelling in the new nature and working by it, which he has produced by regeneration. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, Eph. 5:8—14, v. 9.) "Love" of God and man, of the Saviour, his people, and all men, for his sake, and according to his command and example; a joyful frame of mind in the salvation and service of God; a peaceful conscience, and a submissive will, leading to a peaceable conduct towards man; a disposition to bear injuries and affronts, without seeking revenge or expressing resentment; a mild, unassuming, inoffensive deportment, united with beneficence and philanthropy; truth, sincerity, fidelity, and integrity to man, springing from faith in God and faithfulness to him; a humble, teachable, unambitious temper and demeanour; and an evident moderation about earthly objects, and in respect of every animal indulgence: these, and such like, are "the fruits of the Spirit:" and "against these there is no law," for they are what the moral law requires. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Jam. 3:17,18. 2 Pet. 1:5—7.) So that obedience to the law as a rule, and as "written in the heart" by the Holy Spirit, with delight and satisfaction, and earnest desires after more exact conformity to it, is the apostolical evidence of deliverance from the law, as a covenant of works; and those who really belong to Christ, as justified believers, have actually "crucified the flesh," with all its corrupt affections and rebellious inclinations. (Marg. Ref. k.) The carnal nature, "the old man," is dethroned, confined, condemned, hated, opposed, weakened, and wounded: his death is determined, though the execution be lingering, and to be effected only by a continued course of self-denial; and though he still struggles for life, liberty, and even victory; which perpetuates the believer's conflict, and prevents his complete holiness. But, says the apostle, "if we live in," or by "the Spirit," as regenerate persons; "let us also walk in the Spirit," and order our daily conversation according to that holy influence, and in dependence on the guidance and powerful assistance of the Holy Spirit: especially in mortifying the desire of "vainglory" and human applause, and refraining from whatever may tend to exasperate the minds of other men; or manifest envy of their gifts, reputation, or prosperity. The "body," as meaning the animal nature, must be "kept under and brought into subjection," by proper discipline as a child: but "the flesh" must be crucified, as an enemy and malefactor, which is doomed to inevitable destruction. (Notes, Rom. 6:5—7. 8:3,4,12,13. 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. While so many are struggling for personal and political liberty, or disputing about it, as the greatest of earthly blessings; let us aspire after and "stand fast in the liberty, wherewith Christ has made his people free:" that walking before God with the humble and obedient confidence of children, we may steadfastly reject every "yoke of bondage," with which Satan or his ministers may attempt to entangle us. Especially we should regard the apostle's warnings, to keep clear of all dependence on our own works for justification; as in that case "Christ will profit us nothing." It is to be feared, that very large numbers impose on themselves in this matter: they imagine that the merits of Christ will make up for their deficiencies; while their real dependence is placed on their own morality, alms, devotions, or superstitions. But the divine Saviour will teach us to give him the whole honour of our justification, or he will leave us wholly to stand or fall by our own righteousness; and every man, who trusts to his own works, "becomes a debtor to do the whole law:" "Christ becomes of none effect to him;" he virtually renounces the covenant of grace, and will be dealt with according to the rigour of the covenant of works. May we then keep at a distance from this fatal rock, and be of that number, who "through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith!" For the danger of old did not lie in circumcision: circumcision and uncircumcision were immaterial in themselves, even as many external forms and observances now are: but "faith that worketh by love" forms the essence of the religion of Christ. Without this all else is worthless; and compared with it other things are of small value. Yet many, who "seemed to run well" in this evangelical race, have been hindered from obeying the truth, by those who perplexed them with refined notions, or laboured to proselyte them to some new sect or form: so that, instead of "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," they have turned aside to vain jangling, and zeal for trifling distinctions, and the "shibboleths" of a party. "The persuasion," that religion consists in things of this kind, does by no means accord with the doctrine of the apostles, nor is it from the converting grace of the Spirit. Yet when a little of this leaven gets into even flourishing congregations, it is apt to diffuse itself through "the whole lump." Its first beginnings should therefore be strenuously opposed: and those who would thus unsettle and pervert others, should be censured by their brethren, or even cut off from their communion: and certainly they who persist in disturbing and dividing the church of Christ, must at last "bear their judgment, whosoever they be."

V. 13—18. It becomes us most steadfastly to maintain the pure gospel of a crucified Saviour, whatever offence may be taken, or persecution endured by means of it; but we should be equally watchful against those who "use their liberty for an occasion to the flesh," and of indulging their sensual or selfish passions. "By love" we should become the willing servants of one another, and of all men; and in "loving our neighbour as ourselves," according to the requirement of the holy commandment, we shall most effectually promote our own comfort, and the happiness of families, of the church, and the community. But "a house divided against itself cannot stand;" and when professed Christians, instead of the gentleness of lambs and doves, become like savage beasts of prey, in "biting and devouring one another;" we need not wonder that they are "consumed one of another." Alas, how has Satan prevailed in this way against the church of Christ! What cruel persecutions and fierce controversies have arisen among Christians, so called! How many hopeful prospects have thus been clouded, and flourishing churches ruined! so that the nominal kingdom of the "Prince of Peace" has become a scene of contention and discord! But all this would have been prevented, if men had "walked in the Spirit;" for they would not then have thus "fulfilled the lusts of the flesh."—The most eminent Christians indeed do not attain to all that they desire and aim at; yet those "who are led by the Spirit," habitually oppose, subdue, and mortify those sinful workings which they cannot wholly extirpate.

V. 19—26. It should always be kept in mind that "hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, and envyings," are as much the works of the flesh, as "adulteries, fornications, murders, drunkenness, revellings," or any sensual excess; and that they will as certainly exclude men from heaven, whatever profession of religion they may make; nay, even if religion, in its purest form, is the pretence, subject, or occasion of their malignant passions. The apostle has indeed repeatedly and plainly forewarned us, that they "who do such things," as are here mentioned, or others of a similar nature, "shall not inherit the kingdom of God;" yet what numbers of professed Christians live habitually in the grossest of them; and, notwithstanding their adultery, fornication, shameful uncleanness, or secret lasciviousness, still hope for heaven, in neglect of evangelical repentance and faith! Nor can the

CHAPTER VI.

The apostle exhorts the Christians in Galatia, to restore the fallen with meekness, and to bear each other's burdens, according to "the law of Christ," 1, 2; to beware of self-deception, 3—5; to provide for their teachers; and to persevere without wearying in every good work; being assured that every one will reap as he has sowed, 6—10. He shows the carnal motives and glorying of the Judaizing teachers, 11—13; and determines to "glory in the cross of Christ" alone, by which he is "crucified to the world, and the world to him," 14. Nothing in Christ availe, but a new creation, 15. He prays for peace on "the Israel of God;" desires that none of them would further trouble him, who, as an old soldier, bare the scars of his warfare; and he commends them to the grace of Christ, 16—18.

BRETHREN, [a]if a man be [b]overtaken in a fault, ye which are [c]spiritual, [c]restore such a one [d]in the spirit of meekness; [e]considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted.

2 [f]Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil [g]the law of Christ.

3 For [h]if a man think himself to be something, [i]when he is nothing, [k]he deceiveth himself.

4 But let every man [l]prove his own work, and then shall he have [m]rejoicing in himself alone, [n]and not in another.

5 For [o]every man shall bear his own burden.

7 Be [q]not deceived; [r]God is not mocked: [s]for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.

8 For he that [t]soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh [u]reap corruption: but he that [x]soweth to the Spirit, shall [y]of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

9 And let [z]us not be weary in [a]well doing: [b]for in due season we shall reap [c]if we faint not.

10 As we have therefore [d]opportunity, let us [e]do good unto all men, [f]especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

most idolatrous covetousness, the most exorbitant pride, ambition, and emulation; the most notorious malice, wrath, hatred, envy; or even the murders, committed in revengeful duels, deprive them of their presumptuous confidence. For "he that believeth not, hath made God a liar." Nay, some even attempt to revive the worship of Satan, by various divinations and prognostications, who would nevertheless be offended to be denied the name of Christians! Many also, who are zealous for the apostle's doctrine of justification, and suppose themselves "not to be under the law;" are so far from being "led by the Spirit," that they are evidently and habitually "fulfilling the lusts of the flesh;" though the feeble remonstrances of a conscience, not totally callous, deceives them into an imagination that they are engaged in the conflict of the flesh and spirit! But let us never forget, that those "who are not under the law" for condemnation, are "led by the Spirit" into the love of its precepts, and an earnest desire to obey them. If we bring forth "the fruits of the Spirit," as here described, in our habitual temper and conduct; we can have no objection to the daily examination of ourselves by that perfect standard of sin and holiness; that our love may be exercised "in knowledge, and in all judgment;" for "against such things there is no law."—Those who "are Christ's," (and all others, however distinguished, belong to Satan's kingdom,) "have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts." Yet the imperfection of our attainments leaves much room both for personal humiliation and mutual exhortations. If then "we live in the Spirit," let us also "walk in the Spirit;" watching against spiritual pride and vainglory; not provoking or envying one another, but following after love, and seeking to bring forth more abundantly those "fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God."

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1—5. The apostle, having concluded the argumentative part of the epistle, added some particular admonitions before he closed it. If any brother had been or should be surprised into the commission of sin, through unwatchfulness and temptation, and contrary to the habitual tenor of his conduct; "those who were spiritual," or most matured in judgment and experience, ought to bestow pains to bring him to repentance, and to give him proper counsel and encouragement, in a meek and compassionate spirit, that he might be restored, like a dislocated limb to its place; and not to treat him with harsh rebukes or disdainful neglect. For each of them severally ought to "consider himself," and his own weakness and frailty; as he too might be tempted and overcome; and then he would need that meekness and sympathy, which he had been backward to exercise towards his offending brother. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. a—e.) Thus they ought not only to "bear with one another's infirmities:" (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.) but, as fellow-travellers, to carry each other's burdens: while the stronger brother denied himself, in order to support, comfort, and assist the weak, the tempted, and afflicted; (Marg. Ref. f. Note, Num. 11:11—15, v. 12.) that so, they might fulfil the commandment which Christ repeatedly gave his disciples, "to love one another, as he had loved them;" and which indeed was the substance of "his law," for their conduct towards their brethren. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, John 13:31—35. 15:12—16. 1 John 2:7—11.)—But if, on the contrary, any of them thought himself more wise, strong, or eminent than the rest, on account of his gifts or reputation, and so trusted in himself and despised others; when in fact he was nothing in the school of Christ, having not learned the first lesson of his religion; he was under a grievous and most perilous delusion, his heart imposed on him, and in fact he was his own deceiver. To prevent this fatal mistake, it behooved every individual to "prove his own work" by the touchstone of the sacred oracles, that he might discover whether his habitual conduct, and the motives of it, accorded to the principles, experience, and character of the true believer: that so, instead of arrogantly condemning others, or glorying in others, and their attachment to him or opinion of him; he might find cause of rejoicing and humble glorying in himself, and in the attestation of the sanctifying Spirit to his faith in Christ. (Marg. Ref. h—n. Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) For every man must at last stand or fall, not according to the party to which he belonged, or the judgment of men respecting him; but according to his real character in the sight of God. Indeed "every man shall bear his own burden;" so that, if any were deluded into fatal errors by false teachers, he must bear the punishment of his own guilt: nor would the condemnation of the deceiver exculpate the person, who allowed himself to be deceived by him. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Ez. 14:9—11. 2 Thes. 2:8—12. Rev. 22:14,15.)—The word rendered "spiritual," when applied to persons, seems to denote the spirituality, or heavenly mind and judgment, of those who are thus distinguished: (Notes, 1 Cor. 2:12—16. 3:1—3. 12:1—3.) and is never used, as I recollect, of men endued with miraculous gifts. All rulers, teachers, and workers of miracles, were not "spiritual," spiritually minded, "led by the Spirit," and filled with "the fruits of the Spirit;" and many private Christians were. The duty of restoring the fallen might belong to the teachers and rulers primarily, but not exclusively.—Some indeed suppose, that persons endued with spiritual gifts superintended the churches for some time, without any regular appointment; and that there were no other bishops or elders in Galatia at this time, as little mention is made of them: (6) but this by no means agrees with the history, which mentions the ordaining of elders by the apostles "in every city," either personally, if they had leisure, or by apostolical men, or evangelists, (as Timothy Titus, and others,) if compelled previously to leave the new converts. It is, however, probable, that these elders, and the deacons also, were generally chosen from among those who had been endued with miraculous powers by the laying on of the hands of the apostles. (Notes, Acts 8:14—17. 14:21—23. 19: 1 Tim. 5:21,22,24,25. Tit. 1:5—9.)

V. 6—10. The Lord had appointed the office of the ministry, for the conversion of sinners and the edification of believers: and accordingly the apostle exhorted the Galatians to contribute to the comfortable maintenance of their teachers, who instructed them from the word of God; communicating to them a proportion of their temporal good things, according to their ability. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:4—18.) In this and all things of this kind, they must be careful "not to be deceived" by their own hearts, by Satan, or by false teachers: for, however they might excuse themselves or impose upon men, and then deride their simplicity and credulity; God was not to be thus deceived or mocked.

12 As many [h]as desire to make a fair show in the flesh, [i]they constrain you to be circumcised; only [k]lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ.

13 For neither they themselves who are circumcised [l]keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, [m]that they may glory in your flesh.

14 But [n]God forbid [o]that I should glory, [p]save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by [q]the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

15 For [r]in Christ Jesus [s]neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, [t]but a new creature.

16 And as many as [u]walk according to this rule, [x]peace be on them, and mercy, and upon [y]the Israel of God.

as men often impose on others with false pretences, and then ridicule their folly and credulity. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) But it was most certain, that every man would at length "reap" a harvest correspondent to what he sowed. "He that sowed to the flesh," by continuing to fulfil its lusts, and to indulge his selfish and sensual desires, even under the profession of the gospel, would reap only the corruptible things of this world; his body, which he indulged and pampered, would soon turn to corruption in the grave; and he himself would perish, as unregenerate, and having no inheritance in heaven. But the man who "sowed to the spirit," and under the influences of the Holy Spirit exercised daily repentance, faith in Christ, love to him and his brethren, and other Christian graces; would not only here reap the earnest and first-fruits of inward consolations; but at length inherit everlasting life, as trained up for it by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and as receiving for Christ's sake a proportionable gracious recompense of all his disinterested and faithful services. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, Prov. 11:18,24,25. Ec. 11:1—6. Matt. 25:34—40. 2 Cor. 9:6,7. Heb. 6:9,10.) Let then none "grow weary of doing well," in dependence on Christ and for the honour of his gospel, whatever conflicts, disappointments, persecutions, or temptations they met with: for "in due season," in the time of harvest, they would surely reap an abundant increase of all their labours, self-denial, and expense; if they showed the sincerity of their faith and love, by continuing to the end, "without fainting," in "the work of the Lord." (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, 2 Cor. 4:1, 2. 2 Thes. 3:13. Heb. 12:2,3. Jam. 5:7,8.) While therefore their lives were continued, and opportunities afforded; they ought to make it their great business, and deem it their chief pleasure, honour, and advantage, to be "doing good," according to their ability, to men of every description; but especially to those who were their brethren in the family of God, by faith in Christ; or all professed Christians, who showed their sincerity in professing the gospel, by their temper and conduct: for surely, those learned men, who would substitute the word profession, instead of "faith in Christ," do not mean to include such as evidently make a hypocritical profession. (Marg. Ref. d—f.)

V. 11—14. The words here rendered "how large a letter," are supposed by many persons to signify with what kind of letters, referring to the apostle's want of skill and readiness in writing the Greek language. He had, however, bestowed great pains to write the epistle "with his own hand;" either because he had not an amanuensis with him, or rather because he did not choose to employ one: but he wrote the whole himself, that he might convince the Galatians of his love to them, and anxiety about them. (Marg. Ref. g.) There were indeed professed teachers of Christianity, who aimed to "make a fair show in the flesh," or in respect of external matters, by forming a coalition between the Jewish religion and that of Jesus. (Note, Phil. 3:1—7.) These were so very earnest in urging the Gentiles to be circumcised, that they might be said even to "compel" them; as they would take no denial, and exhausted all their eloquence and ingenuity to overcome their reluctance. But, notwithstanding their attachment to the ritual law, they would not have been so earnest in this matter, if they could otherwise have possessed their influence in the Christian church, without exposing themselves to persecution for professing faith in Christ and his cross. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) For not only did the Jews hate and persecute those who preached the gospel to the Gentiles, without regarding the Mosaic law; but the heathen rulers also, who tolerated the Jews and such Christians as observed the law, were inveterate against the Gentile Christians, and deemed them an upstart sect, dangerous to the civil government. (Notes, 4:17—20. 5:7—12.) This crafty and selfish aim of the Judaizing teachers, of advancing themselves to consideration in the Christian church, without exposing themselves to persecution, induced them to be very zealous in proselyting the Gentiles to the Mosaic law; but they were not equally strict in their own observance of it. Not only were they negligent of the moral precepts; but probably, on one pretence or other, they dispensed with themselves and one another, in respect of the more burdensome and expensive of the ceremonial institutions, many of which could not be observed in countries distant from Jerusalem. (Note, Matt. 23:1—4.) It was therefore evident that they desired the Gentiles to be circumcised, only that they might glory in having induced such numbers, to bear in their flesh this mark of their being proselyted by their means. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, Matt. 23:15.) This both placed them at the head of a Christian sect, and also tended to procure them favour and reputation with the Jewish rulers and others. But the apostle added, with a noble disdain of such base motives, "God forbid that I should glory, &c." He would not value himself on any thing which he had received, attained to, or performed, either before or since his conversion; except in his dependence on the sufferings and death of Christ upon the cross, as a sacrifice for sin; and in the hopes, comforts, and blessings, which he had thence derived. (Marg. Ref. n—p. Notes, 1 Cor. 1:20—24. 2:1,2.) In this indeed he greatly gloried; and his view of the cross of Christ, and of the obligations, motives, and instructions connected with it, had crucified the world to him and him to the world. 'So that he viewed the world, as little impressed by all its charms, as a spectator would be by any thing that had been graceful in the countenance of a crucified person, when he beholds it blackened in the agonies of death; and was no more affected by the objects around him, than one that is expiring would be struck with any of those prospects which his dying eyes might view from the cross on which he was suspended.' Doddridge. He disdained the friendship, riches, honours, and pleasures of the world, and disregarded its reproach and hatred, as he would have done those of a crucified malefactor; seeing in the cross of Christ the condemnation of all unbelievers without distinction: and the love of all things, of a worldly nature, being crucified by his view of the awful justice and holiness of God even in showing mercy, the evil of sin, the wickedness of man, and the importance of eternity, which the cross of Christ exhibited, and by that grace which he died to procure for him. To show forth the love of his crucified Lord, to point him out to sinners, to honour him in his own conduct, and to teach others to love and glorify him, was the great business of his life: all else was comparatively beneath his notice. (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, Phil. 1:19—26.)

V. 15, 16. The views above stated raised the apostle far above all regard to circumcision or uncircumcision, (Notes, 5:1—6, v. 6. Rom. 14:13—18. 1 Cor. 7:17—24.) and all things in which true Christians might think or act differently; assured that regeneration, or a new creation to the image of Christ, as evidential of faith in him, was the great distinction between one man and another: (Marg. Ref. t. Note, 2 Cor. 5:17—21.) and to all men, Jewish or Gentile converts, who walked with God, as in Christ, new creatures, glorying in his cross only, and crucified by it to the world, he desired that mercy and peace might abound; even to the true "Israel of God," as distinguished from the unbelieving nation of Israel. V. 17, 18. As what had been written was abundantly sufficient to satisfy all humble inquirers; the apostle desired that he might not thenceforth be troubled and disquieted by such disputations. None ought thus to add to his sufferings; for he already bare in his body the marks and scars of the wounds which he had received in the cause of Christ; and which he deemed far more honourable than the external badge of circumcision.—Some think, that the marks which slaves and soldiers received, showing to what master or commander they belonged, are alluded to. But the scars of the stripes and wounds which he had received for Christ's sake, are indisputably meant. (Marg. Ref z, a.) These ought to have endeared him to them, as he exposed himself to persecution for their good. He therefore desired, that the grace and free favour of Christ might be with their souls, to comfort, establish, and sanctify them; and then he knew, that they would be more affectionate to him, and less attached to abolished externals. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. There is a great difference between those who habitually live in known sin, and such as are "overtaken with a fault," to which the best of men are liable.—The reality and degree of our spirituality should be evinced, by tender and compassionate endeavours to restore the fallen, and confirm the weak, "in the spirit of meekness;" conscious that we too are liable to be tempted, and have need of humble watchfulness, and constant dependence upon God.—Our Christian liberty is enjoyed, in proportion as we "fulfil the law of Christ," in loving the brethren, and "bearing one another's burdens," with compassion and self-denial.—But alas! many "think themselves to be something when they are nothing, and so deceive themselves." Let us then "prove our own work;" and seek rejoicing and "glorying in the Lord," from the assurance of our own conversion, and not in the opinion of others concerning us, or from being attached to the party of any leader; seeing that "every man must bear his own burden." (Notes, Rom. 14:10—12. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.)—Those who love the gospel, and are taught according to the word of God, will not grudge the faithful minister a proportion of their "good things:" men may, in this and in other matters, impose on others, as well as deceive themselves; but God will not be trifled with.—As the present is our seed time for eternity, let us diligently and impartially examine what we are now sowing; and what our harvest is likely to prove, beseeching also the Lord himself to search and prove us. (Note, Ps. 139:23,24.) If hitherto any man have "sown to the flesh," and is afraid that "of the flesh he shall reap corruption;" let him begin, by repentance, faith, and prayer, to "sow to the spirit," that he may at length reap everlasting life. (Note, Ps. 126:5,6. P. O.) And let none, who have begun thus to "sow to the spirit," "grow weary in well doing; assured that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—For not only do those who "have no root in themselves," lose all their labour about religion, by drawing back in the time of temptation; but even believers often lose much of the comfort and usefulness, which they were likely to obtain, by fainting in part, through disappointment, and for want of stronger faith, more fervent zeal, and more patient, persevering hope. Let us then watch against this; remembering that we are the servants of Christ, and that it is our duty, "as we have opportunity, to do good to all men, but especially to the household of faith."

V. 11—18. There have always been professors and teachers of religion, who "desired to make a fair show in the flesh," to render religion subservient to worldly interests or distinctions, and to escape the cross. Such men will commonly be more zealous to make proselytes to a party, than converts to Christ; that they may glory in the numbers who are attached to them, and added to their society. But the consistent Christian is nobly disdainful of these low aims: he glories in the cross of Christ alone, as the Foundation of all his hopes; and this faith in a crucified Saviour "crucifies the world to him, and him unto the world;" as he desires to "live no longer to himself, but to him who died for him, and rose again." (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31, vv. 30,31. 3:18—23. 2 Cor. 5:13—16. 10:17,18.) Thus he overcomes the love of worldly objects, and is reconciled to hardships, poverty, reproach, and hatred for his Lord's sake. If we then are "in Christ new creatures," we have the kernel and the substance of religion, and may leave others to contend about the shell or the shadow of it. Yet we should desire "that mercy and peace may be upon all, who walk according to this rule, and upon the whole Israel of God."—They are peculiarly blameable, who trouble and grieve those soldiers of Christ, that "bear in their bodies" the scars of the wounds which they have received in "fighting the good fight of faith:" but we should not wonder or be disconcerted, should our most disinterested and self-denying labours meet with this recompense alone from those whom we have most loved. And we must still pray, that "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with their spirit;" as well as expostulate with them concerning their misconduct, and warn them of their danger.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

ALTHOUGH it does not appear to have ever been disputed, that the epistle before us was written by St. Paul; yet it is well known, that a doubt has long been entertained concerning the persons to whom it was addressed. The question is founded on some ambiguity in the external evidence. Marcion, a heretic of the second century, as quoted by Tertullian, ... calls it the Epistle to the Laodiceans.—The name, Ephesus, in the first verse, upon which word singly depends the proof that the epistle was written to the Ephesians, is not read in all the manuscripts now extant. I admit, however, that the external evidence preponderates, with a manifest excess, on the side of the received reading.' Paley. The same learned writer proceeds to argue from internal evidence, that the epistle could hardly be written to a people, with whom the apostle had resided three years: (Notes, Acts 19:8—12. 20:29—31.) and it must be acknowledged, that in this respect it more resembles the Epistle to the Romans, and that to the Colossians, than those epistles which the apostle wrote to the Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, and Thessalonians; in which there are constant allusions and appeals to what had past when he resided among them. As, however, the 'external evidence preponderates, with a manifest excess, in favour of the received reading;' and as Dr. Paley seems to be mistaken in supposing that the word Ephesus was wanting in any manuscript extant,* it is in this exposition adhered to: though it may be observed, that the change of the word Ephesus for Laodicea, or the total omission of it, would in no respect deduct from the abundant instruction contained in the epistle itself.—'It has been said, that if this epistle was directed to the Ephesians, it is difficult to understand how the apostle contented himself with giving them a general salutation, without mentioning any of his numerous friends and acquaintance, with whom he had been intimate during his long residence at Ephesus. But the answer is, ... there are no particular salutations, in the epistles to the Galatians, the Philippians, the Thessalonians, and to Titus, because, to have sent particular salutations to individuals in churches where the apostle was so generally and intimately acquainted, ... might have offended those who were neglected. ... And to have mentioned every person of note in those churches, would have taken up too much room. In writing to the Romans, the case was different. The apostle was personally unknown to most of them: ... and therefore he could, ... without offence to the rest, take particular notice of all his acquaintance.' Macknight. The successful ministry of the apostle in the renowned but licentious city of Ephesus, and his solemn charge to the elders of the church there founded, when they came to him at Miletus, have before been considered. (Notes, Acts 19: 20:17—35.) Some years after, he wrote this epistle, during his imprisonment at Rome, and probably near the close of it; (6:20.) to establish them in the great doctrines of the gospel, to guard them against errors, to excite them to a holy conversation, and to animate them in their Christian warfare.—This epistle, and the two that follow it, which were also written during his imprisonment, and probably about the same time, are remarkable for a peculiar pathos and ardour, or rapture as some have called it; and this is generally ascribed to the extraordinary consolations enjoyed by the apostle, during his sufferings for Christ's sake. But his mind was doubtless enlarged to a remarkable degree in writing to those whom he had no occasion to rebuke, and with whom he was not under the necessity of engaging in controversy: so that entire confidence of affection took place of the caution, reserve, or sharpness, which were requisite in the three preceding epistles.—Learned men, according to their different hypotheses, suppose, that the apostle continually refers, in this epistle, to the mysteries of Diana, to the Gnostics, or to the Judaizing teachers; but it may fairly be questioned whether, writing with an inexpressible flow of holy affections, on the great subjects which rejoiced his heart; he had express reference to any of those things, of which expositors, more coldly speculating on his words, have imagined.—Perhaps, he had some general regard to the Judaizing corrupters of the gospel: but, as the epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time, and in other respects greatly resembles this, is far more explicit on that subject; it may be supposed that the Ephesians were less in danger from that quarter.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes the Ephesians, 1, 2. He blesses God for the spiritual blessings, which he had conferred on them and him, as "chosen in Christ," and "predestinated to the adoption of children," 3—5; as "accepted in the Beloved," "through the redemption of his blood," and "his grace abounding toward them, in all wisdom," 6—8; as gathered, and made heirs with his people, "to the praise of his glory, by first trusting in Christ," 9—12; and as "sealed by the Spirit of adoption, the Earnest of their inheritance," 13, 14. He thanks God for them, and prays that God would more completely illuminate them, and give them deeper experience of the grace and comforts of the gospel, 15—18; "according to the mighty power, by which Christ had been raised from the dead," and exalted as "Head over all things to his church," 19—23.

PAUL, [a]an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, [b]to the saints which were at Ephesus, and to the [c]faithful in Christ Jesus:

2 Grace [d]be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 [e]Blessed be the [f]God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, [g]who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings [h]in heavenly [i]places [k]in Christ:

4 According [l]as he hath chosen us in him [m]before the foundation of the world, [n]that we should be holy and [o]without blame before him [p]in love:

5 Having [q]predestinated us [r]unto the adoption of children [s]by Jesus Christ to himself, [t]according to the good pleasure of his will,

6 To the [u]praise of the glory of his grace, wherein [v]he hath made us accepted in [x]the Beloved:

7 In [y]whom we have redemption through his blood, [z]the forgiveness of sins, according [a]to the riches of his grace;

8 Wherein [b]he hath abounded toward us [c]in all wisdom and prudence; [Practical Observations.]

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Rom. 1:1—7, v. 7. 1 Cor. 1:1,2.) By "the faithful in Christ Jesus," the apostle might mean either believers in Christ, or such as approved themselves to be his "faithful" soldiers, servants, and stewards. (Marg. Ref. c. Luke 12:42. 16:10—12. 1 Cor. 4:2. 1 Thes. 5:24. 2 Thes. 3:3. Heb. 3:2,5. 11:11. 1 John 1:9.) Faithful. (1) Πιστος. John 20:27. Acts 10:45. 2 Cor. 6:15. 1 Tim. 4:3,10,12. 5:16. 6:2. Note, Col. 1:1,2.—Some have supposed, that the expression was intended to include other believers, as well as "the saints at Ephesus:" but it may be rendered, "even the faithful in Christ Jesus." (Marg. Ref. a, b, d.)—Grace. (2) 'This grace is given by the communication of the Holy Ghost, from the Father and the Son, to the church: (John 14:23.) which is the reason that the Holy Ghost is not mentioned in these salutations.' Whitby.

V. 3—8. The twelve verses, from the third to the fourteenth inclusive, properly speaking, form one sentence. The apostle's mind was so full of his subject, that he was not very exact about his style; and this renders a double degree of attention requisite in those readers who would fully enter into his meaning. We shall, however, better understand his argument and doctrine, by considering the passage in a more detached manner.—Reflecting on the great things which God had done for him, and by him, especially among the Gentiles, the apostle broke out into the most rapturous praises and thanksgivings unto God on that account. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:1—7, v. 3.) He could do no other, than "bless the God and Father of the Lord Jesus," and celebrate the praises of his name, who had dealt so graciously with his believing people; and had conferred on them all spiritual blessings, which could be desired or enjoyed in respect of "heavenly things," and as the earnest of heavenly felicity; by giving his Son Jesus Christ for them, and by calling them to believe in him: or, by exalting Christ, as their Surety, Advocate, and Forerunner, into "the heavenly places," God had at once, as it were, conferred all spiritual blessings on every believer, as united unto him, and one with him. (Marg. Ref. e—i.) This resulted from his choice of them, "in Christ," and "as given to him," (Note, John 6:36—10.) even "before the foundation of the world;" not because he foresaw they would, of themselves, be more holy than others of their fallen race; but that they "might be holy," by separation from sin, consecration unto God, and the sanctification of the Spirit, in consequence of their election in Christ. (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:13, 14. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.) Thus he purposed to render them "blameless before him in love;" not only in respect of their complete justification in Christ; but by their present integrity and sincerity in the professed love of Christ, of each other, and of all men; by their "blameless" walk "before God, in all his commandments and ordinances;" and at length by making them perfect in holy love and heavenly felicity. (Marg. Ref. k—n.) For he had "predestinated," or foreordained them, to be adopted as his children by faith in Jesus Christ; and to be openly admitted to the privileges of that high relation to himself, notwithstanding their original and actual sinfulness. (Note, Rom. 8:28—31.) In doing this, according to his sovereign will and pleasure, he intended to exhibit the glory of his rich, free, and distinguishing grace, in the most illustrious manner; that they, and innumerable multitudes of redeemed men and holy angels, might celebrate the praises of it for ever: as by that glorious grace, he had made them (lost sinners, both of the Jews and Gentiles) "accepted in his beloved" Son, being made the "righteousness of God in him;" so that, as the Father was well pleased in his beloved Son, he was also well pleased with them for his sake.—Or has "highly favoured us in him:" (Luke 1:28.) seeing all other blessings flow without fail from justification in Christ. (Marg. Ref. p—x.)—For though in themselves they had been condemned criminals, enslaved, and imprisoned, under the curse of the law, and the power of sin and Satan, without any possibility of delivering themselves; (Notes, Gal. 3:10—22.) yet Christ had paid a complete ransom for their souls, when he shed his blood on the cross; and, having been brought into a state of union with him, by regeneration and faith, they had obtained a complete redemption: their sins having been fully pardoned, and their souls set at liberty, from the fetters and dungeon of their former wretched condition. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Rom. 3:19—31. Tit. 2:14. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. Rev. 5:8—10.) This deliverance accorded to the unspeakable abundance of the free mercy and grace of God: his love appointed this method of redemption, provided the Redeemer, "spared not his own Son," brought them to hear and embrace this salvation, freely pardoned all their sins, gave liberty to their captive souls, supplied all their wants, and invested them with the richest variety of privileges and blessings.—In exercising such astonishing grace, after so abundant a manner, the Lord had also acted "with all wisdom and prudent" counsel: for whereas mercy to criminals often gives encouragement to crimes, and disgraces or weakens the hands of government; his method of grace was so wisely ordered, that it showed sin in all its odiousness and desert of vengeance; exhibited the divine justice and holiness in the most tremendous glory, even in showing most abundant mercy; manifested all the attributes of God in glorious harmony; furnished the most effectual motives to the believer's future obedience; and tended directly to subvert Satan's empire of ungodliness and iniquity. So that the wisdom of God never shone so bright in the view of all holy intelligences, as in this display of the riches of his glorious grace. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 3:9—12.) Exalted and mysterious wisdom had also been displayed, in all the steps by which the way was prepared for the revelation of this plan, and in the time and manner in which it was revealed.—Blessed, &c. (3) When we bless God, we speak well of him, when he blesses us, he powerfully confers blessings on us. Chosen, &c. (4) 'He speaks of whole societies in general, as consisting of saints, . . . because this was the prominent character. . . . Nor did he always judge it necessary to make exceptions, in reference to a few hypocrites who had crept in among them; any more than Christ judged it so, to speak of Judas as excluded, when he mentions the twelve thrones on which the apostles should sit. (Matt. 19:28.)—In this view he says of them in general, that they were chosen, . . . not to those present privileges, which they as all professed Christians enjoy, but to real holiness and everlasting glory.' Doddridge.—Predestinated, &c. (5) "Predestination to the adoption of children," should be carefully distinguished from actual adoption; which is subsequent to regeneration and actual believing, and makes way for the Spirit of adoption. (Notes, John 1:10—13. Rom. 8:14—17.)

V. 9—12. The blessings before-mentioned were communicated to believers, by the Lord's "making known to them the mystery of his will," respecting the method of redemption and salvation; and the admission of sinners into his family by faith in Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles. All these arrangements had been made "according to his good pleasure, which he had purposed in himself;" for, as he advised with no counsellor, so he gave no account of his holy, wise, and righteous appointments. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Job 33:12,13. Rom. 11:33—36.) Having revealed these things to the apostles, and by them to the church; his divine teaching had led those whom "he had chosen," to see the glory of those truths which others were left to blaspheme. Thus were they made to "know the mystery of his will;" and to understand, that "in the dispensation of the fulness of times," which at length had been introduced, the Lord purposed to "gather together," as into one kingdom or family, in his beloved Son, and under his government, "all things in heaven and earth." So that not only Jews and Gentiles would become one church; not only were the saints, who had before gone to heaven, to be considered as one body under one head, with believers on earth; but even holy angels, and all the inhabitants of heaven, as confirmed in Christ, and his worshippers and subjects, would form one kingdom with redeemed sinners, and join with them in adoration, love, and obedience. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g, h.) By virtue of their relation to Christ and union with him, the apostle and the Jewish converts in the first instance had obtained this glorious "inheritance;" "having been predestinated, according to the purpose" of that glorious God, who carried on his work of creation, providence, and redemption, according to the wise counsels, and that perfect plan, which he has seen good to form. (Marg. Ref. i—m.) And while most of their countrymen had been left under judicial blindness and unbelief, to be monuments of God's awful justice; they had been selected "for the praise of his glory," being brought "to trust in Christ" for salvation, by the power of divine grace, as the first-fruits of the Christian church; though in themselves deserving of wrath, no less than their unbelieving Jewish brethren.—Gather, &c. (10) 'As when orators form a brief recapitulation of their arguments, or the heads of their discourse; so believers are said to be collected together in Christ. . . . For Christ is He, in whom all the elect, from the creation of the world, otherwise wandering from God, are gathered together; of whom were some in the heavens, when he came on earth; (who indeed had been gathered together, by faith in him who was to come;) others being found on earth, were gathered together, and are daily gathered to him.' Beza.—The union of angels with redeemed sinners, in one company of worshippers, seems also intended. V. 13, 14. Not only the Jews, who had embraced the gospel; but the Gentile converts also, especially those at Ephesus, had "to the praise of the glory" of God, been led to believe and hope in Christ; (Marg. Ref. p—s. Notes, 2:11—13. Acts 19:8—12,23—31.) when "the word of truth," the glad tidings which proposed salvation to sinners, had been preached among them: for having believed that word, and so believed in Christ, they had been sealed by the Holy Spirit, who had been promised by the ancient prophets, and by Christ himself, before his ascension into heaven. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Is. 44:3—5. 59:20,21. John 14:15—17. Acts 1:4—8.) This cannot, with any propriety, be explained of miraculous powers. These were not the "earnest," pledge, and foretaste of heaven, as this "seal" is declared to have been: for many unsanctified persons exercised miraculous powers. But the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit seal believers, as the children of God and heirs of heaven; they are the first-fruits of that holy felicity, and they impress the holy image of God upon their souls. (Notes, 4:30—32. 2 Cor. 1:21,22.)—Thus the Ephesian converts were preserved, supported, and comforted, and would be, during their time of trial and suffering in life and death; till they should at last be put in full possession of that complete redemption, which Christ had ensured to his "purchased people:" or till the inheritance, which sin had forfeited, but which Christ had "purchased" for them, should be, so to speak, fully rescued from the hands of their enemies, and they put in complete possession of it, at the resurrection of the dead; to be for ever monuments erected "to the praise of the glory of God." (Marg. Ref. y—z. Note, Rom. 8:18—23.)—All these things are so evidently distinguishing of true Christians, and so inapplicable to collective bodies of professors of Christianity; that we must conclude the apostle spoke of election, as gratuitous, as personal, and not national; and of effectual vocation as inseparably connected with eternal life: and learned men need far more ingenuity than has yet been employed in the argument, to make the apostle's words speak any other language, consistently with the rules of grammar and of common sense. (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9:1—5. 11:1—6.)

V. 15—23. The apostle had, for some time, witnessed the conduct of the Ephesians: but, having been absent from them at least six or seven years, he had again heard of "their faith in Christ, and love to all his saints;" which excited him without ceasing to thank God for his grace and mercy towards them, and animated him in mentioning them expressly by name, in all his secret and social prayers. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Note, Col. 1:3—8.) Especially, he entreated the God whom the Lord Jesus Christ, as Man, had worshipped and obeyed, (Note, John 20:11—17, v. 17.) even "the Father of glory," the great Author of all that glory which is visible in the whole universe, that he would still more abundantly communicate to them the Holy Spirit, from whose influence all divine wisdom is derived to men; and who discovered to the hearts of believers the certainty, nature, and "glory" of those truths, which by prophets and apostles he had revealed to the church. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Note, John 16:14,15.) That so, every veil of prejudice, pride, and sin being removed, they might more completely know God in Christ, and more confidently acknowledge their relation to him. (Notes, Luke 24:44—49. Acts 16:13—15. 26:16—18. 2 Cor. 3:12—18. 4:3—6.) That, "the eyes of their minds being illuminated," they might understand more clearly, and experience more deeply, the value of that grand Object of "hope," to which God had called them by his gospel; and perceive what riches of grace, consolation, and spiritual blessings, were comprised in that "glory," which constituted "the inheritance conferred on his saints;" or the rich abundance and revenue of glory, which the Lord would derive from his saints, as "his chosen inheritance." (Marg. Ref. h—o. Notes, Deut. 32:9.) And, that that they might perceive what "exceeding greatness of his power' had been exerted in their conversion to the faith; and was still engaged to uphold, strengthen, and defend them, to perfect their new creation, and to complete their redemption from Satan, sin, and death; according to the display of the same mighty power which was put forth in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ. (Marg. Ref. p—r.)—It is remarkable that the apostle seems here studiously to have exhausted the utmost vigour of the Greek language to express, by a beautiful accumulation of energetic words, the omnipotence of God, as effecting the believer's conversion and salvation, continuing, as it were, that exertion of it, by which the Redeemer was raised from the dead. (Notes, 2:4—10. 3:20,21. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—Our version well renders the passage: yet the emphasis of the original is not preserved, nor perhaps can be in a translation.—In consequence of the resurrection of Christ, he had been exalted, in human nature, to the right hand of the Father, on the mediatorial throne "in heavenly places," far above all creatures, however dignified: not only above the princes of the earth; not only as the conqueror and destroyer of the powers of darkness; but even far above the hierarchies of heaven, however distinguished as "principalities, or powers, &c." yea, above every name that ever was or will be celebrated on earth or in heaven; either during the continuance of "this world, or that which is to come." (Marg. Ref. s—z. Notes, Matt. 28:18. John 5:20—29. Phil. 2:9—11. Col. 1:15—20. 1 Pet. 3:21,22. Rev. 1:12—20.) And as all creatures were subjected to his government, so all enemies were virtually put under his feet: seeing he has power and authority to crush them as he pleases: and will continue to do this, in the proper seasons, till the last enemy shall be destroyed. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Having thus exalted the risen Saviour, the Father has constituted him absolute and universal Governor of the world, and given him to be "the Head of the church," that he might employ his unbounded authority and almighty power for its benefit: so that the whole is exercised in subserviency to his purposes of grace, and to render effectual his redemption, in the final salvation of his chosen and redeemed people. For the church is his body; he is the Head of life and authority to the whole company of believers, as united to him; and they are dear to him, and are taken care of by him, as the members of his body: so that he, "in whom all fulness dwells," is not complete in his mediatorial character, except in the preservation and full salvation of his whole mystical body. And, while he fills heaven and earth with his glory, he fills his ordinances with his power and gracious presence; and dwells in every believer, by his Spirit of life, purity, and love: he condescends to deem them essential to his own fulness of glory; even as every member of the body is to the completeness of the human nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. Faith in Christ, and faithfulness to him, unite in forming the character of his saints: and to the sovereign grace of God we wholly owe it, if we are either true believers, or approved ministers. "God our Father," from whom, "and the Lord Jesus," through whom grace and peace are given to sinful men, ought to be adored and praised for all those spiritual blessings with which we are or hope to be blessed in time and to eternity. The appointment of the eternal Son of the Father, as the Surety for fallen man, in the divine foreknowledge, is the source of all the hopes and comforts of those who "were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy, and without blame before him in love." For personal holiness was provided for, in every part of the counsel of God, respecting man's salvation. So that the renewal of our hearts to the divine image, and a blameless walk before God, from love to him and to our brethren, are the proper evidences that we "were predestinated" and have been called by God, to "the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will." For when this purpose of God took effect, by our being "made accepted in his beloved Son, in whom we have redemption through faith in his blood, even the forgiveness of our sins, according to the riches of his grace;" then, as the children of God, who is LOVE, we began to bear his image and became followers of him. (Notes, 5:1,2. 1 John 4:7,8.) Thus the change wrought, as well as the mercy shown, are "to the praise of the glory of his grace;" the reconciled rebel, the adopted son, gives all the praise of his salvation to his gracious Father; his actions, as well as his lips, declare the praises of the divine mercy; and it appears evident, that most adorable "wisdom and prudence" were conjoined with unspeakable grace, in forming and executing the holy plan of man's salvation.

V. 9—14. The mysteries of God, in man's redemption, must have been for ever hidden from us, if he had not made them known to us by his gospel, and his Spirit of truth. Thus, in every respect, he dispenses his blessings according to "the good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself." If, in accomplishing his grand design of "gathering together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and in earth," he has brought us to seek and obtain an inheritance among his redeemed people; we shall at length, and ought now, thankfully to acknowledge, that we were "predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." He sent "the word of truth, the gospel of salvation" to us, while others were left in darkness and without even 'the means of grace;' he "quickened us," when others were left "dead in sin;" he enabled us to trust in Christ, as well as sealed our pardon by his sanctifying Spirit, as the earnest of our future glorious inheritance. —We need not wonder that self-wise and self-sufficient men deride and dispute against these humbling and spiritual mysteries: nor is it at all desirable, that they should embrace them as a scheme of doctrine, in a proud, carnal mind. But, that humble believers, who allow their own hearts to be as evil (except as renewed by divine grace) as those of their most irreligious neighbours, should be afraid of tracing back their present experience of that grace to the sovereign purpose and electing love of God in Christ; that in giving him the whole glory of having "made them to differ," they may also possess a ground of assurance of his perfecting his good work in their souls: this, I say, is matter of surprise to those who find the sweetest animation and encouragement from the glorious review and prospect; and in every past and present mercy possess a pledge and earnest of future and eternal felicity.

V. 15—23. If any, who appear to have "faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to all the saints," are dazzled by the sublime

CHAPTER II.

The apostle shows the Christians at Ephesus their former ruined state, as dead in sin, slaves of Satan, and "children of disobedience;" among whom he and all believers once were, being "by nature the children of wrath, even as others." 1—3. All who do not perish are saved "by grace," "in Christ," "through faith;" and "created unto good works," 4—10. The Gentiles were once "without Christ, without hope, without God;" but by the special grace of God, through the atonement of Christ, all who believed were brought nigh, and reconcile l to God; had access to him; and were formed into one church with Jewish converts, the ritual law being taken away by the death of Christ, 11—18. Thus they became one family and temple, a habitation of God through the Spirit, 19—22.

mysteries above stated: their more established brethren should not forget, "who has made them to differ" in this respect also; and, instead of forming rash judgments, and engaging in angry disputations, (which are peculiarly unsuitable on this subject,) they should thank God, for what he has done for them, and pray always for those whom they deem mistaken. (Notes, Rom. 14:1—6.) Indeed, we all need to pray for ourselves and each other, "to the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory," (Note, Matt. 6:13.) for a larger communication of "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of him." We shall do far more, in this way, towards bringing believers to "be of one mind and judgment," than by eager and acrimonious controversies, however ably conducted: "for a man can receive nothing, except it be given him from above;" and high confidence on one side of the question, commonly excites the same on the other side, with all its hateful consequences. But, if we disputed with less earnestness, and prayed with greater fervency for each other, "the eyes of our understandings being enlightened," we should daily see more and more "what is the hope of our calling, and the riches of God's glory, in the inheritance of his saints."—When most sensible of our own weakness and the power of our enemies, we shall most perceive and experience "the greatness of that mighty power" which has effected our conversion, and is engaged to perfect our salvation. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) For the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, his universal and sovereign authority and almighty power, were all intended for our benefit, if we be indeed the members of his mystical body the church; which is "the fulness of him who filleth all in all." The immensity of this love and condescension, and of our privileges, should excite our enlarged expectations; our unspeakable obligations, if duly apprehended, will constrain us by love to live to our Redeemer's glory; and thus our humble, holy, and cheerful lives, will vindicate our doctrine from the calumnies of those who "speak evil of such things as they understand not." (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 1 Pet. 2:9—12.)

NOTES.—Chap. II. V. 1, 2. The almighty power of God, which "raised Christ from the dead," (1:20.) had also raised to spiritual life the Ephesians, who had been "dead in sin." For the words, "hath he quickened," seem to have been properly, from the fifth verse, supplied by our translators: as, in the original, that verse appears to take up and conclude the sentence here begun, merely by changing you into us, entirely in the apostle's manner. To be "dead in trespasses and sins" implies an utter incapacity for spiritual employments and satisfactions; the want of all desire after that felicity, which holy creatures enjoy in the favour and service of God; and a moral inability of worshipping and obeying him with love and delight: even as a dead man is utterly incapable of the business and enjoyments of life. The employments and pleasures of animal nature, and even those of a rational being, are within the capacities of a man who is "dead in sin;" but he cannot relish or desire spiritual pleasures. He may be an epicure, or a philosopher; but he cannot find satisfaction in the peculiar employments of a saint. For while "dead in sin," he must be "carnal;" and "the carnal mind is enmity against God," and opposition to the holy law. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, John 3:3. Rom. 5:12—14. 8:5—9.) Such a man therefore must be an apostate and an idolater, who seeks happiness in the creature, not in the Creator: and he lives only to disobey, to pursue worldly things, to corrupt himself and others, and to aggravate his condemnation as a transgressor of the divine law. Thus "the saints and faithful brethren at Ephesus," had been "dead in trespasses and sins," and had habitually walked in them, and had lived under an accumulating load of guilt, and the power of their evil propensities, without concern about the consequences. Thus they had proceeded according to the customs, fashions, and maxims "of this present evil world." They had acted in the same manner as their neighbours, and as other men did all over the earth. Indeed this was "according to the course of this world," and according to the will of the devil: a dreadful advance on the preceding clause, though evidently contained in it. They had copied the example and yielded to the temptations of Satan, "the god" and "prince of this world," that arch-apostate and rebel, who has the seat of his empire in the air, and there exerts his power and influence. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Note, 2 Cor. 4:3,4.) This last circumstance at least accorded to the notions then prevalent among the Jews, and even among the Gentiles, concerning their genii and demons: which, whether to be understood literally or figuratively, was sufficient for the apostle's purpose. There, "in the air," Satan and the legions of fallen angels which are subordinate to him continually wait their opportunity of tempting men to sin; by keeping from their minds good thoughts, and serious impressions, or quenching them, and exciting the enmity of their hearts against them, and by suggesting others of a contrary tendency. In this way, the devil maintains his dominion; and men in general copy his example of rebellion, enmity, and contemptuous defiance of God; of pride, ambition, envy, malice, deceit, and destruction; or they gratify his malignity, by destroying themselves and each other, through gross sensualities, or by horrid war, and murder committed in various ways, and under many plausible pretences; or his ambition, by idolatry, impiety, and infidelity. Thus the believers at Ephesus had walked, "according to that spirit which still worked in the children of disobedience," that is, in those who persisted in unbelief and rebellion against God. Or, as it may be more literally rendered, "according to the prince of the power of the air, of that spirit which now worketh in the children of disobedience." Satan is the author and ruler of that proud, carnal, and impious disposition, which is in ungodly men: his temptations first produced it in human nature; and he works on it by the agency of evil spirits, to instigate it to all wickedness in thought, word, and deed. Thus he rules in man's heart: he possesses, as it were, all unbelievers: and he prompts, and as it were inspires with wit and ingenuity, the advocates for vice, impiety, and infidelity, by whom he maintains his empire in the world. V. 3. The apostle before spoke of the Gentile converts exclusively, or at least principally: but here (in the same manner, as in the Epistle to the Romans, he proved the Jews also to be under sin,) he turns his discourse, and includes both himself, and all the converts from his nation, among those who once were "dead in sin" and slaves to Satan: and he proceeds to use the first person plural to the end of the seventh verse, and then he again addresses the Gentile converts.—'He could not mean the Jews,' say many learned men, 'because they had not been idolaters.' But had the apostle at all mentioned idolatry? and is there no way of conforming to the world and serving the devil, except by gross idolatry? To suppose that the apostle spake of himself, as one of the Gentiles, or one of the church of Rome, where he then was, as chiefly consisting of Gentile converts, is so absurd in itself, so unsuitable to his argument, so needless after what he had said of the Gentiles, and so contrary to his language, and that of the most eminent saints in other parts of Scripture, that nothing, it may fairly be presumed, could have reconciled learned writers to it, but the necessity of adopting it, in order to avoid the doctrine of "original sin," in the full and proper meaning of the terms, as true of all men, Jew, Gentile, or Christian, as 'naturally engendered of Adam's race;' and so to avoid also the doctrine of 'regeneration,' or a real new creation of the soul, by the power of the Holy Spirit.—The author of these notes was once deeply engaged in this scheme, being strongly attached to Mr. Locke's views; but this very text shook his whole system to the foundation. Much above forty years have elapsed since that time: and he has had abundant time, and has bestowed no little pains, in reconsidering the subject; but is more and more deeply convinced, that the interpretation is wholly unscriptural; and that it tends to evaporate the meaning of the sacred oracles, as if we had little concern in the greatest part of them.—Not only were the idolatrous Ephesians thus "dead in sin," and under the power of Satan; but the apostle, and all other Christians then on earth, had "in times past their conversation among them," as alienated from God, and disobedient to him. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) They lived "in the lusts of their flesh," or according to the desires of their carnal hearts; gratifying their animal appetites in sensual wickedness; or the proud, ambitious, covetous, and malignant tempers of their minds, as constitution, custom, or education swayed them; without any proper regard to the authority, will, glory, or favour of God. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, John 3:6. Rom. 7:5,6. 8:5—9. Gal. 5:16—21.) So that the Jews as well as the Gentiles, and the Christians as well as those who remained unconverted, were "by nature" "dead in sin," "and children of wrath," one as well as another. For, being born of Adam's fallen race, averse to good and prone to evil, they were alike in the temper of their hearts, and the conduct of their lives, deserving of the wrath of God, and meet objects of it. (Marg. Ref. n—p. Note, Rom. 9:22,23.)—Great pains, as it has been observed, have been employed to prove, that "nature" may signify custom, or habitual practice. But the attempt has been evidently baffled in the critical argument. At the same time, stubborn facts prove, that men called Christians are "dead in sin," as much as the Gentiles were; and that the children of believers are as prone to evil, and averse to good, as those of idolaters. And surely no one can suppose, that "worldly lusts" are more excusable in Christians, than in heathens!—The word rendered "by nature," seems never to have been used for any other customs, than such as resulted from innate propensities: and the whole tenor of the Scripture, as well as the experience and confessions of the most pious persons who ever lived, confirm the interpretation, and expressly contradict that more flattering one, which some have attempted to substitute in its place.

V. 4—10. Even when the apostle and his fellow-Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, "were dead in sin," incapable of helping themselves, and meet objects of wrath and abhorrence in the sight of God, he "loved them" with an exceedingly great love: not for any thing which he saw or foresaw in them, but because he was "rich in mercy," and delighted in the most abundant and illustrious exercise of it. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 1:3—8. John 3:16. Rom. 5:6—10. Tit. 3:3—7. 1 John 4:9—12,19.) Having therefore loved them, and given his own Son to die for their sins, and raised him as their Surety from the dead; the same immensely free mercy influenced him 'to raise them from the death of sin,' by a continued exercise of that almighty power which had raised the Saviour. Thus he "quickened them," or made them alive, "together with Christ," in virtue of his resurrection, with life communicated from him by the Holy Spirit. (Note, 1:15—23.) So that they were saved, or "had been saved," wholly by unmerited grace; whether their election, redemption, or conversion, were considered. Being thus raised to a new life, in conformity to their risen Lord, they in him, their Head, Representative, and Surety, were "made to sit in heavenly places;" their future glory was ensured by his ascension and exaltation, and by their union with him; and their treasures, hearts, and hopes, were already in heaven with "Christ their Life." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—z. Notes, John 14:2,3. Rom. 6:8—10. Phil. 3:20,21. Col. 3:1—4. Heb. 6:16—20.)—'For by means of that relation between him and us, which divine grace has established, we may look upon his resurrection and exaltation to the right hand of God, as the certain pledge and security of ours, and may be said to share in those felicities and dignities, which are conferred on him.' Doddridge. (Note, John 14:18—20.) This whole plan had been formed and executed, that "in the ages to come," in future generations, and future worlds, the Lord might display "the exceeding riches of his grace," by the astonishing kindness shown to rebels and enemies, and "children of wrath" in Christ Jesus; that so, men and angels, and all created intelligences, to eternity, might behold, admire, and adore his glorious mercy and love in these transactions. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) The apostle would therefore repeat and enlarge upon the hint before given; that "they had been saved by grace;" they were brought into a state of salvation, by the mere mercy of God, through faith in Christ: and even this faith, which effected their relation to him, was not of themselves; their proud and carnal minds having been utterly averse to the humbling and spiritual doctrine: but it was the free gift of God to them, the effect of their being quickened or regenerated by his Spirit. Thus their pride and enmity, their love of sin and the world, were subdued; and they were brought to believe the gospel, and to trust in Christ. This salvation therefore was in no degree or way "of works, lest any man" should have a ground of boasting, that he did, of himself, contribute in some degree to his own happiness, or of glorying over his neighbour. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, Rom. 3:19—28. 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) For, though believers differed greatly from other men, and from their former selves; this was the effect of a divine power exerted upon them: they were "the workmanship of God," who in Christ had wrought a new creation upon their souls; giving new principles, or propensities, to their several faculties, and a new direction to their affections and desires. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 2 Cor. 5:17.) Thus their disposition and ability to love God, and to do good works, should be considered as a part of their salvation, not as the cause of it: for it was the purpose of God, that his redeemed people should habitually walk in good works, from their conversion, till they finished their course; and their holy lives were the effect, evidence, and recommendation of their salvation by grace.—'Both faith and works are God's workmanship; both are necessary; but the one the fruit of the other.' Maclaurin.—That not. (8) If this be understood of the whole of salvation, faith must be included. (Note, John 1:10—13.)—The term "good works," is never used, in the New Testament, for ritual obedience, or moral virtue as practised by unbelievers, or for any other works than "the fruits of the Spirit." If any one doubt of this, let him consult a good concordance. The only text, which seems an exception, is Rom. 13:3. and that means 'works good before God,' primarily, though perhaps not exclusively. Without doubt, regeneration and sanctification by the Spirit of Christ, are as much a part of our salvation, as redemption and justification.

Προητοιμασεν. See on Rom. 9:23. Walking in good works forms an essential part of that plan which God has formed for man's salvation: and he prepares believers by his grace to fall in with this arrangement. (Note, Is. 35:8—12.)

V. 11—13. Having spoken of the general state of fallen man, and the salvation of all believers, by the rich grace and mercy of God; the apostle next proceeded to show the Gentile converts the peculiarities of their case, which had placed them much further out of the way of mercy than the Jews had been. He would have them "remember," that they had been not only "dead in sin," but "Gentiles in the flesh," as to their outward state, their gross idolatries, immoralities, and sensuality; so that they had been called "the Uncircumcision," in contempt and aversion, as polluted and out of covenant with God; even by those Jews, who had only the outward circumcision in the flesh, of man's operation, without the "circumcision of the heart." (Marg. Ref. m—p. Notes, Jer. 9:25,26. Acts 7:51—53. Rom. 2:25—29. 3:27—31. 4:9—12. Gal. 2:6—16. Col. 2:11,12.) At that time they were, in every sense, "without" or separate from "Christ:" being "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," and its peculiar advantages as the visible church of God, in which his ordinances were administered, his oracles deposited, and the expectation of a Messiah given and maintained. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) They had also been "strangers from the covenants of promise;" the Abrahamic covenant, that made with Israel at Sinai, the covenant of royalty, and that of the priesthood; in all which the Messiah was the great blessing promised. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Rom. 3:1,2. 9:4,5.) So that, whatever notions they might have a of future state, they had nothing on which to ground "a hope" of acceptance and happiness in it: all their expectations of that kind were mere presumption; and, whatever demons, idols, or imaginary beings they worshipped, they were indeed "atheists in the world," as to the only true God, and as to the effect of their fables or speculations upon their conduct; which was nearly as bad as it would have been if they all had been avowed atheists: seeing that their abominable idolatry led them perhaps into more immorality, than it restrained them from; besides the impiety inherent in it. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) But at length those who had been by nature, practice, custom, and external situation, so very far off, from the worship, service, love, favour, and image of God, were "brought nigh" to him, as in Christ Jesus by faith; thus they were admitted into a state of acceptance, reconciliation, and friendship with God, through the atoning blood of Christ; and were become his peculiar people and spiritual worshippers. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—How rude and affronting would a company of unhumbled impenitent sinners, especially in a superior station of life, consider it, should a friend in a letter, or a minister in a sermon, at present address them in this language! The marked distinction also, of the case of the Gentiles from that before described, confirms the interpretation given of the third verse.—Remember, &c. (11) Notes, Deut. 8:2. Ps. 103:1,2. Is. 51:1—3. Ez. 16:60—63. 36:31. 1 Cor. 12:1—3.—Without God.] The Gentiles had "gods many, and lords many;" the Ephesians were zealous worshippers of Diana, yet they were atheists "in the world."—If indeed "no man knoweth the Father, but he to whom the Son reveals him;" all men who reject the gospel, whether idolaters, unbelieving Jews, Mohammedans, deists, or Socinians, must be "without God," according to the apostle's meaning in that expression. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. Luke 10:21,22. John 5:20—23. 2 Cor. 1:1—7. 1 John 2:20—25.)—"Separate from Christ;" "having no hope;" "atheists in the world." What was the apostle's views of the state of the Gentiles, in respect of salvation? What his judgment as to the duty of seeking, by all scriptural means, their conversion to Christianity? V. 14—18. In every sense, Christ was to be considered as "the Peace" of all Christians; the Author, Centre, and Substance of reconciliation to God, and of the union of Gentile converts with Jewish believers in one church. For he had effected a cordial peace between those discordant parties, (who had before exceedingly despised and even detested each other,) by "breaking down that partition-wall," which had so long separated the Jews from the Gentiles; namely, the ceremonial law, to which the Gentiles were extremely averse, even when otherwise favourable to the worship of Jehovah; and of which the Jews were tenacious and proud, to a degree of disgusting bigotry. But Christ, by assuming human nature, and fulfilling, in his priestly character, especially by his sacrifice on the cross, these typical institutions, had abolished them; and thus removed the ground of enmity of the Jews and Gentiles against each other, concerning them. So that this law, (the commands of which consisted of external ordinances,) having lost all its use and obligation; the Gentiles were admitted into the Christian church, without submitting to the yoke or the ceremonial law, or being deemed unclean because uncircumcised. (Marg. Ref. a—e. Notes, Acts 10:9—16,27—33.) Thus they became "one body" with the believing Jews; that so Christ might create, as it were, "One new man," consisting of regenerate persons, both Jews and Gentiles, united to himself the Head, quickened by his Spirit, "walking in newness of life," harmonious in worship and obedience, and mutually loving and doing good to one another. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 4:11—13. Is. 11:6—9. Rom. 12:3—5. 1 Cor. 12:12—31. Gal. 3:26—29.) In this way, Christ was the Peacemaker between Jews and Gentiles: and at the same time, he "reconciled both, in one body, unto God." For the ceremonial law implied man's state of condemnation, pollution, and enmity against God; to whom he could not approach, except on an external mercy-seat, and by priests, sacrifices, incense, and purifications; being, after all, kept at a great distance from him: but the death of Christ upon the cross took away the guilt which was the cause of "the enmity;" that so a holy God might honourably pardon and be reconciled to his rebellious creatures. And it made way for the communication of the Holy Spirit to regenerate sinners, and so to destroy "the enmity" of their hearts against the holy character, worship, and service of God. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Having finished this great design, he came, by his apostles and ministers, to preach the gospel, or glad tidings, even peace with God and with each other, to the Gentiles who "had been far off," and to the Jews who were outwardly "nigh" to God. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, Is. 57:19. Acts 10:36—43. 2 Cor. 5:17—21. 2 Thes. 2:13,14.) For through the Person, sacrifice, and mediation of Christ, believers of all descriptions were allowed access to God, as a Father; and were introduced with acceptance into his presence, with their worship and services, under the immediate teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, as one with the Father and the Son, in this great work of salvation, as well as in the unity of the Godhead. (Marg Ref. l—n.) It should be noticed that, in the seventeenth verse, the apostle, distinguishing the Gentile converts from the Jewish, says, "you that were far off;" thus evidently ranging himself among the Jewish converts, who were comparatively nigh. This is natural, and perfectly destructive of that unnatural interpretation, by which he is supposed to include himself among the Gentile converts. (Note, t.) The wall, which separated the uncircumcised Gentiles, who came to worship the God of Israel at the temple, from the Jews and the circumcised proselytes, is generally supposed to be alluded to, by the "middle wall of partition." For, under the Christian dispensation, the Jewish and Gentile converts all worship together, as one body, animated by one soul, and speaking by one tongue. (Notes, Col. 2:10—23.)

V. 19—22. The Gentile believers were no longer "strangers and aliens," excluded from the privileges of God's people, as foreigners are from those of native subjects: or as those, who from other nations came occasionally to worship at Jerusalem, were from the stated or resident worshippers, whether Jews or proselytes. But they were become "fellow-citizens" of the heavenly Jerusalem, with the most eminent "saints" of Israel; they belonged to "the household of God," not only as servants but as children. (Marg. Ref. o—q.) Nay, they were made a part of the spiritual temple, which the outward sanctuary had typified; having been "built upon the foundation," which prophets of old, and apostles of late, had laid in their doctrine and in their writings; of which foundation, and of the whole superstructure, Jesus Christ himself was "the chief Corner-stone," the Centre of union, the Cement, and Support. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, Matt. 16:18. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) Upon him "the whole building, being fitly framed," according to the counsel and plan of the divine Architect, "grew up to a holy temple in the Lord;" being dedicated to his glory, the place of his special presence and power, in which he delighted to be worshipped. (Marg. Ref. u—y.)—Thus, by the continual conversion of sinners, and the progressive sanctification of believers; while each individual in his proper place, conduces to the stability and proportion of the whole, and is himself consecrated and preserved by being a part of it; the spiritual temple is erecting from age to age, and will be till its full completion in heaven. So that, the Gentiles, being in Christ by faith, were "builded on this foundation" laid by prophets and apostles, whose predictions and doctrine related to "the chief Corner-stone." Thus they became a part of the temple, together with Jewish believers; for the special in-dwelling of God, who by his Holy Spirit reigned in them, communicated his peculiar blessings to them, and was glorified by them. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, Ps. 118:19—24. Is. 28:16. Zech. 3:9,10. 6:12—15. Matt. 21: 40—44, Acts 4:5—12. 1 Cor. 3:16,17. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Rev. 21:9—21.)—This is a most decisive testimony to the divine inspiration of the prophets and apostles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—3. We cannot duly value the gospel, unless convinced that we are in ourselves "dead in trespasses and sins;" and that we must have perished, if God had left us, as he most justly might have done. Yet, when we had neither title to happiness, not capacity for it; when we were unable to help ourselves, and unwilling to attempt it; when we were utterly insensible of our danger, ready to vindicate our conduct, and perhaps proud of our wisdom, strength, and goodness, the love and mercy of God were extended to us! This indeed is still the case with the immense multitudes, "who walk according to the course of this world," in the broad way of destruction: (Note, Matt. 7:13,14.) for those who go with the stream, who conform to this world, and "live in pleasure, are dead while they live." They seek liberty in the bondage of Satan: and that "prince of the power of the air" illudes his numerous votaries with gay phantoms of fancied good; and enables them to build magnificent palaces in his unsubstantial element: that they may neglect "the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Thus millions copy his example of rebellion, and do as he would have them. He still "works in the hearts of the children of disobedience;" he prompts "his ministers of unrighteousness" and infidelity: (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) and, while he emboldens them to deride the doctrine of Scripture, concerning divine influences, and the agency of good and evil spirits, he must feel a horrid pleasure, mingled with contempt of the folly of those who are thus deluded by his deceptions. There is no doubt a black inspiration; and Satan and his angels working on pride, enmity, and love of sin, in the hearts of ungodly men, teach them to invent, propagate, and ingeniously defend, impious or infidel notions, and to excuse or palliate their ungodliness and worldly lusts.—But indeed, in one way or another, "we have all had our conversation among" these "children of disobedience," under Satan's influence, and fulfilling the desires of our carnal minds, and, on the broad ground of Scripture, we may assert with confidence, that, whether men have been more prone to sensual or to spiritual wickedness, all are alike "by nature the children of wrath;" that those who oppose this humbling tenet are yet "dead in sin;" and that the state of those, who know little or nothing of this in their own experience, is very doubtful.

V. 4—10. In proportion as we judge of ourselves as justly condemned sinners, so will be our apprehensions of Christ and his salvation: the more fully we perceive our guilt and pollution, the greater will be our astonishment and adoring gratitude, in contemplating the immensity of the love and the rich mercy of our God: and we shall not only allow the gift of Christ, of pardon, and of eternal life, to be most free, and contrary to our deservings; but we shall ascribe the change which we have experienced in conversion, to the abundant "love of God to us, even when we were dead in sin." By his power we were quickened together with "Christ:" (Note, Rom. 8:1,2.) he taught us to aspire to an inheritance in the heavenly places, with our risen and ascended Redeemer: and the same considerations, which will excite the admiration, and be the delightful theme, of all holy creatures throughout a blessed eternity, now lead us to adore "the exceeding riches of the grace of God, in his kindness to us" hitherto. When we reflect on the infinite majesty of God, the immensity of the creation, the meanness and wickedness and deep depravity of man, and the stupendous plan of redemption; we shall not be able to account for such favour shown to us, except we also consider, that "the exceeding riches of divine grace," will be proportionably displayed and glorified, in the view of the whole creation, on account of each of these circumstances, and of very many others, to eternal ages. "We are then saved by grace, through faith; and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God:" for if it had been at all of works, or man could in any respect have boasted, the glory of God had not been complete. Yet let none infer, that this is an unholy salvation, for all who partake of it are "God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works," and his purpose and efficacious operation concur in securing the willing and active obedience and holiness of all true believers. So that none can, on the ground of Scripture, either pervert the doctrine to licentiousness, or accuse it of that tendency; and all who attempt either of these things will be "left without excuse."

V. 11—22. Besides the general ruined state of all men, every one of us should recollect those peculiarities of situation, character, and disposition, which set us at a greater distance from salvation, than others of our fellow-sinners. The immoral and licentious conduct of some; the impiety, infidelity, or dangerous heresies of others; the pharisaical pride of many; an utter disregard to religion, and ignorance of even its forms and first principles, with various other circumstances, had rendered the case of some persons peculiarly perilous; and should increase their humility and gratitude, if at length they have been converted. Many of us were once without the external knowledge of Christ, at a distance from the professors of his gospel, "strangers to the covenants of promise;" having no thought or concern about future happiness, or hope of it, and living as atheists in the world. These things should be brought into the account, in order to increase our love and zealous obedience; if we, who once were so very "far off, are brought nigh by the blood of Christ." Through this great Peacemaker, how near may the chief of sinners approach to a reconciled God! (Note, Ps. 73:23—28.) How harmoniously then should believers live together, as members of one body and children of one family! May his grace reconcile all who profess his truth, to God and to each other! May every "par

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—7. Some expositors suppose, that all between the first verse and the beginning of the next chapter, is a kind of parenthesis: but it seems more obvious to render the sentence, "For this cause, I Paul, am the prisoner of Jesus Christ." The apostle's zealous preaching to the Gentiles, and openly admitting them into the Christian church, without circumcision, or observance of the ritual law, which implied the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, had so irritated the Jews, that they had apprehended him at Jerusalem; in consequence of which he was at this time a prisoner at Rome, in the cause of Christ, and for the sake of the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Acts 21:27—30. 22:22—30. Gal. 5:7—12. 6:11—14. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) As he was therefore "the prisoner of Christ for them," they ought to read his epistle with peculiar attention; since they had heard of the manner in which he had been converted, and intrusted with "a dispensation" to "preach the gospel of the grace of God," as the apostle of the Gentiles; and how Christ, by immediate revelation, had made known to him "the mystery" of his love: as he had briefly written to them in the preceding chapters; on an attentive perusal of which, they would readily perceive his extensive "knowledge in the mystery of Christ." (Marg. Ref. d—k. Notes, 1:3—14. 2:1—10.) This had not in former ages been made known to mankind, with that clearness with which it was at length "revealed to the holy apostles and prophets" of Christ by the Holy Spirit: especially it had not been understood, that the Gentiles, without being proselyted to the Mosaic law, should be admitted to be "fellow-heirs" with the Jews of their covenanted blessings; forming with them one mystical body, on embracing the gospel. (Marg. Ref. l—q. Notes, 2:11—22.) Of this new "dispensation" Paul had been "made a minister;" having received the gratuitous pardon of his sins, and abundant mercy and favour from God; and having been effectually changed by the powerful operation of his Spirit, and qualified for that important service. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, 1:15—23. Gal. 2:6—10. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.)—Those who had statedly attended on the ministry of the apostle, during his residence at Ephesus, must often have heard from him concerning "the dispensation of the grace of God which was given to him" in behalf of the Gentiles; (2) but numbers out of the adjacent regions, coming to Ephesus, heard the gospel from him; many of whom, it is highly probable, returning home, both professed and preached it: and these might need more full information on this subject, which was no peculiarly interesting to the Gentiles.—St. Peter was sent to Cornelius, the first Gentile convert: but it does not appear, that the whole design of God, respecting the union of uncircumcised and idolatrous Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, in one church with Jewish believers, was so so clearly revealed to him, as it was soon after to St. Paul. At least the latter, with his coadjutors, proclaimed this doctrine, so encouraging to the Gentiles and offensive to the Jews, far more avowedly, and to immensely greater numbers, than any other of the apostles of whom we read in Scripture.—Some indeed imagine, that the apostle meant to show, that the value of the Christian revelation was vastly greater than that of the curious books which the Ephesians had burned, (Acts 19:19.) and than the mysteries of the initiated in the worship of Diana. But if the former were indeed "the oracles" of Satan, and the latter probably no better; we can hardly conceive that the apostle would disgrace "the oracles of God," by such a comparison. The same may fairly be said of several other comparisons or allusions, which learned men suppose the apostle to have intended.—The mystery here spoken of seems very improperly confined, by many expositors, to the calling of the Gentiles; whereas, the mysterious salvation, by Emmanuel's righteousness and atonement, through faith, and by the new creation of his Spirit unto holiness, which the Gentiles were called to partake of in common with the Jews, and on which the apostle had before enlarged, and to which he was about to return, (9) was also evidently intended. The former, as exclusive, is at best but a meagre interpretation; the latter perfectly agrees with the apostle's manner, when speaking on a subject of which his heart was full.

V. 8. The apostle here formed a new word, to express the deep sense which he had of his own unworthiness: this is very properly rendered, "less than the least of all the saints" tition wall" be pulled down, and every enmity slain, which prevents the complete union of Christians, as "one new Man in Christ!" May he go with his ministers to the ends of the earth, "preaching the glad tidings of peace to those that are afar off!" May his gospel be more fully and faithfully and successfully dispensed among "those that are nigh!" May sinners every where seek and find "access to the Father," through the Son, and by the Holy Spirit! If we are experimentally acquainted with this way of access to our reconciled God: we are "no more strangers and foreigners, whatever once we were; but fellow-citizens of the saints and of the household of God." We have no "law of commandments contained in ordinances," to keep us in bondage, to drive us to a distance, or to excite enmity among brethren; except such as are of human invention. The instituted ordinances of worship, appointed by our Saviour, as well as his moral precepts, are suited to aid and encourage our approach to God, and our walk with him; to excite our holy affections, and to conduce to our peace with one another, when properly understood and attended on. Sinners, in these far distant regions, now hear Christ "preaching peace" to them, and are invited to seek access to God through him; believers "are built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ being the chief Corner-stone;" that they may be "a habitation of God through the Spirit." Let us then inquire, whether we are "builded on this foundation;" whether our hopes are fixed on Christ, according to the doctrine of his word; whether we have devoted ourselves as "a holy temple" to God through him; whether we be "a habitation of God by the Spirit;" whether we be spiritually minded, and bring forth "the fruits of the Spirit." If this is our experience and privilege; let us take care not to defile the temple of God, nor to grieve our holy Comforter; let us earnestly, and with fervent, constant prayer, desire his gracious presence with us, and his influence on our hearts; let us endeavour to fill up the place assigned us, to the glory of God: and let us study to promote the peace and purity of the holy temple to which we belong, and to forward that work by which it is continually approaching towards its full perfection. Especially, let us seek, and pray, and improve to the uttermost our influence, be it more or less, for the conversion of the Gentiles, who are still "without Christ, without hope, and without God in the world," and for the restoration of the poor scattered Jews, and of all Israel, to those privileges and blessings, from which they have been so long excluded through unbelief; "that they, through our mercy may obtain mercy:" and that Jew and Gentile, all over the world, may unite in adoring and serving the God of Salvation, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

He does not seem to have adverted exclusively or principally to his former conduct, as a persecutor and blasphemer. That indeed made him deem himself "the chief of sinners;" but here he speaks of himself as "a saint," though most mean and unworthy of that title. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 1 Cor. 15:3—11, vv. 8,9. 1 Tim. 1:12—16.) In general, this must be ascribed to his unaffected humility, his self-knowledge, acquaintance with the holy law, near communion with God, and candour towards his brethren: and perhaps those humiliating infirmities, of which he repeatedly spoke, were in some degree taken into the account. But the consideration of his peculiarly aggravated crimes before conversion, and the unparalleled mercy and favour which had been shown him, gave him such a sense of his immense obligations, and of the returns of love, gratitude, zeal, and holiness, which became him: that he regarded his attainments and experience much more beneath the proper standard, than those of any other true Christian. 'Surely,' thought he, 'no other believer loves the Lord, in a degree so disproportioned to his obligations, as I do!' All his obedience, labours, usefulness, and even sufferings, would be considered as so many additional favours bestowed on him: and that coldness of affection, or rising of evil in the heart, which he could bear with in others, he deemed inexcusable in himself. (Notes, Rom. 7: 18—25.) This did not, however, lead him to doubt of his being a saint; but only to stand more amazed at the love of the Lord toward him: and under this impression, he uttered the feelings of his heart in such energetic language, as very few can use with propriety or sincerity: though many employ the words, rather as expressive of what they ought to mean, than of what they really feel concerning themselves; and some, no doubt, as affecting the praise of humility!—On so great a sinner, and so unworthy a believer, was this astonishing grace conferred: that he should be employed as an apostle, to preach among the idolatrous Gentiles, through many nations, "the unsearchable riches of Christ!" The immensity of the divine Redeemer's condescension and mercy; the preciousness of his blood and salvation: the fulness laid up in him, and the freeness with which it was bestowed; the privileges of his people, and their glorious inheritance; those "riches of Christ," which were not provided for himself, or for holy creatures, but purchased for the chief of sinners; for the payment of their debts, the ransom of their souls, and the enriching of them to all eternity; which sufficed for all the multitudes that ever had come, or should come to him for them, how many soever they were; which never could be exhausted or diminished, by the most liberal and profuse communication of them, or leave the glorious and gracious Proprietor less rich than before, to the ages of eternity: these are "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and they baffle the powers of computation, nay, even of imagination; they are incomprehensible and infinite. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, John 1:16. 2 Cor. 8:6—9, v. 9. Col. 2:1—4, v. 3.) This was the great subject of the apostle's ministry among the Gentiles, whom he called to come and partake of "these unsearchable riches" by faith in Christ.—It may be very useful to compare the animated language of this chapter, with the cold reasonings of modern theologians, and their extreme caution lest they should speak too highly of Christ and his salvation.—The labours, perils, and sufferings of the apostle, in his preaching to the Gentiles, were so many and great; that nature would have deemed it an intolerably hard and perilous service, and declined it by every possible means: but grace, inspiring him with love of Christ, zeal for his glory, and a longing desire for the salvation of souls, made him think it an unspeakable privilege. (Notes, Acts 20:18—21. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) What an example for modern missionaries! And what a view does it give us of the desirableness, the importance, and the honour of that service.

V. 9—12. This "preaching of the gospel, concerning the unsearchable riches of Christ," was appointed, that men of all nations and descriptions might perceive the happy "fellowship," or partnership (so to speak) of Jews and Gentiles in the blessings of salvation; according to the mysterious plan, which had been formed from the beginning in the counsels of God, but had been hidden from his creatures in general; save as he had given some previous intimation of it "by his prophets," and had at length more fully discovered it by Jesus Christ; by whom, as the eternal Word, he at first created all things, and was now effecting a glorious new creation. (Marg. Ref. a—e. Notes, John 1:1—3. Col. 1:15 —17. Heb. 1:1,2.) To the intent that angels and archangels, even "the principalities and powers," who were around the throne of God "in heavenly places," and had, from the beginning, witnessed and adored the displays of his wisdom, in the works of creation and providence, should now discover still more surprising and most gloriously and beautifully varied displays of it, in his church of redeemed sinners while they beheld rebels changed into spiritual worshippers, all the Persons and perfections of the Godhead more abundantly glorified, even by means of man's apostacy; Satan's devices turned against him, and the most discordant characters united in one loving family, or as "one Body in Christ." (Marg. Ref. f—i.) All this was effected "according to the purpose of God," which from eternity he had conceived in his infinite mind, of saving sinners by Christ Jesus our Lord. Through faith in him, being made partakers of his salvation, both Jewish and Gentile believers had obtained the privilege of coming before God with a humble boldness, notwithstanding their reverence of his infinite majesty and purity; and with a confidence of being accepted, and receiving abundant blessings, notwithstanding their conscious guilt and pollution.

V. 13. As so great honours redounded to God, and b'essings so rich and abundant were conferred on men, through the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles; the apostle was well satisfied with his sufferings on that account; and he entreated his brethren at Ephesus not to be discouraged, or to turn aside from their profession, on account of them; either for fear of being exposed to similar persecutions from the Jews; or through the insinuations of Judaizing teachers, who might attempt to prove, that Paul had done wrong in disregarding the legal ceremonies, and thus had needlessly exposed himself to persecution. Whereas, his constant and patient endurance of sufferings, in defence of the liberty of the Gentile churches, was indeed an honour to them: it manifested the importance of their cause in his judgment, and it showed the temper of the bigoted Jews: it should therefore animate the Gentile converts to stand fast in the liberty of the Gospel.—The verse may indeed be rendered, "I pray not to faint at my tribulations for you:" but the sense given in our version, and by most expositors, is far more energetic, and far more in the manner of the apostle. tations; but his affectionate desire of their prosperity was unabated: so that, during his imprisonment, he "bowed his knees" in constant prayer for them, "unto the Father of our Lord Jesus: of whom the whole family" of believers on earth, and saints and angels in heaven, "are named" and considered as the children of God, being gathered together in one in Christ. (Marg. Ref. o—r. Note, 1:9—12.) To "the Father of the Lord Jesus," and of the whole family, the apostle prayed, that, "according to the riches of his glory," his plenteous mercy, which was emphatically "his glory," he would grant them to be powerfully "strengthened by his Spirit," in all the holy dispositions of their renewed souls, in faith, reverential fear, love, gratitude, hatred of sin, hope, patience; that thus they might be steadfast amidst temptations and persecutions, enjoy comfort, and glorify God in every situation and duty. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, Ps. 138:3. Is. 40:27—31. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13. Col. 1:9—14, v. 11.) That Christ, being welcomed to their hearts by faith, to be their Lord and Saviour, "might dwell" there, as the sovereign of all their affections and actions, and the source of all their joys: that so they might be "rooted," as a tree in a deep and fertile soil; and grounded as a building on a firm foundation, by their supreme love to Christ, and his salvation, cause, and people; and thus be secured from turning aside or growing negligent, and be rendered stable and fruitful in their profession; and that they might also be enabled to "apprehend" and understand, as all true saints did in some measure, the immensity of the love of Christ to his people. (Marg. Ref. x—b.) This had in it a "breadth" commensurate with the boundaries of the earth, as it extended to sinners of every nation and character; a "length" equal to the duration of the world, yea, extending from eternity to eternity: and a "depth and height" which might be contemplated in the abject state of deserved wretchedness, in which Christ viewed sinners, from the height of his essential glory, the depth of suffering and abasement to which he stooped for their salvation, and the height of present privilege and future felicity to which he advanced them. In short, the apostle prayed, that they might, spiritually and experimentally, "know the love of Christ, which passed knowledge," even that of all created beings; and could never be fully understood, being in all respects infinite and incomprehensible: that they might be so filled with heavenly knowledge, holy affections, and consolations, as to leave no room in their souls for error, ignorance, sin, or infelicity; but that the fulness of the divine power, grace, light, love, and joy, might wholly occupy their hearts; and that their powers might be so enlarged, as to receive more and more of these, till they should be "filled with," or "unto," "all the fulness of God," as his temple was with his glorious presence. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Note, 1 Kings 8:10—14.) "The whole family in heaven and earth" (15) may include all holy creatures; but certainly none of the obstinate enemies of God. Perhaps the redeemed from among men are exclusively meant; and Christ, as the immediate antecedent, is He, from whom this family is named Christians.—"The height, &c." is here explained, as connected with "the love of Christ," mentioned in the following verse. But the glorious plan of redemption in general may be meant: this, however, does not materially alter the sense.

V. 20, 21. The apostle added to his most enlarged petitions, an act of adoration suited still more to exalt the expectations of the readers. He ascribed glory to God, as "able" not only to do all that he had asked, but "above all," "abundantly above all," "exceeding abundantly above all," not only which he or the Ephesians had asked, but even all which they had thought, desired, or imagined! So that they might stretch their thoughts, enlarge their desires, and multiply their most comprehensive petitions to the utmost; yet they never could reach the whole of what God was "able" to bestow upon them, or what he honourably could do for them in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) Nay, all which yet remained to be done, in order to complete their felicity and glory in soul and in body, was "according to that power," which had effected their redemption from the dominion of Satan, and their new creation to holiness; and which still upheld, preserved, and renewed them, amidst all their temptations and trials. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, 1:15—23. 2:4—10. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:32—34.) To this God of power and grace unspeakable, the apostle most earnestly desired, that glory, adoration, and praise, should continually be rendered, in every part of the church, by Christ Jesus, throughout all the ages of time, and to all eternity: and he closed this most rapturous act of devotion, by affixing his AMEN to these his prayers and praises, (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:10—20. Ps. 72:17—19.) In attempting to explain such portions of Scripture, it is almost impossible to avoid comparative flatness and insipidity: an inspired writer alone could do justice to them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Should we be called to suffer, even unto bonds, in the cause of truth, and "as the prisoners of Christ;" we may hope to endure the cross with that cheerfulness and satisfaction which holy Paul expressed: but our feelings would be very different, if we should "suffer as evildoers, or busybodies in other men's matters." This should teach Christians in general, and ministers especially, not to leave their proper employment, to which the dispensations of Providence and of divine grace have called them; and to seek continual instructions from the Lord, both as to "the mysteries" of the gospel, and the path of duty: that so their profiting in the knowledge of Christ, and their competency for the office assigned them, may be evident to all men.—We enjoy very great advantages for these studies; as the mysteries of redeeming love were not made known even to ancient prophets, so clearly as they now are to those believers in general, who are well acquainted with the word of God: (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and our encouragement is proportionably great, as we "sinners of the Gentiles" are "fellow-heirs" with the ancient people of God in all the promised blessings, if we indeed are "in Christ" by faith in him, and by the participation of his Holy Spirit. "The gift of the grace of God," and "the effectual working of his power," are necessary to form a guilty, depraved sinner into a faithful minister: and deep humility, united with exalted thoughts of Christ and his "unsearchable riches," are invariable characteristics of those who are appointed and prepared in this manner to the sacred service. Indeed, when we consider our own sinfulness by nature and practice; and contrast the poverty of our attainments, the coldness of our affections, and the manifold defilements of our conduct, with our obligations and opportunities, and the glorious theme on which we ought to insist continually: we may well tremble at the thoughts of preaching, in the name of so holy and exalted a Saviour, even to the meanest of our fellow-rebels. But those "unsearchable riches of Christ," which we would recommend to others, may give ample encouragement to our own hearts: and our deepest humiliation will not abate our confidence of hope, if we duly advert to the power and love of our Redeemer. His "riches are as unsearchable" as ever: we should therefore invite "the chief of sinners" to leave their gilded toys and glittering indigence, to come and be enriched by Christ. We should earnestly desire and pray, that all men might know the blessedness of the communion of the saints, with God and with each other, through the mystery of the Person and mediation of Emmanuel, by whom all worlds were created, and our souls were redeemed; and by the communion of the Holy Spirit. While angels adore "the manifold wisdom of God," in his church of ransomed sinners, the ignorance of self-wise and carnal men pronounces the whole design to be foolishness! But they, who by faith are admitted to share those blessings "according to the eternal purpose of God" in Christ, behold some glimpses of this glory, and are prepared for the adorations of heaven. With humble boldness, and reverential confidence, they are taught to approach "the throne of grace" by the faith of Christ: and thus they receive such

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle exhorts his brethren to a consistent walk in humility and love, as united by manifold most endearing bonds, 1—6: to a peaceful improvement of gifts and endearments, and performance of duties, for the good of the church; from regard to the ascended Saviour, and the nature of his communications and appointments, for the edification of his saints, 7—16: to a conduct peculiarly distinguished from that of the Gentiles around them; living taught by Christ, dead to sin, and continually more and more renewed to the divine image, 17—24: to avoid deceit and anger, 25—27; to labour in what was good; and so to shun dishonesty, and to practise charity, 28; to use their tongues in holy discourse, and not in unholy, 29; to beware of grieving the Holy Spirit, 30; and to meekness and kindness, after the example of the love of God in Christ, 31, 32.

I THEREFORE, [a]the prisoner [*]of the Lord, [b]beseech you that ye [c]walk worthy of the [d]vocation wherewith ye are called, supports and consolations, as keep them from fainting, on account of those tribulations which Satan and wicked men employ to discourage them; or which in any way are allotted to them.

V. 13—21. Men of generous minds often consider more the effects which their sufferings may have on others than their own feelings under them: and they who know human nature will fear, lest others "should faint" on account of those trials endured by themselves for their sake, which are indeed their glory.—The instructions and admonitions of ministers or others should always be watered, as it were, with fervent prayers: and we may serve our brethren or relatives in this way, when precluded from all other methods. While therefore we "bow our knees before the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" as the Father of "the whole family in heaven and earth;" we should not fail to supplicate him in behalf of others in every part of the world; remembering "the riches of his glory," and entreating him to deal with us and with them according to them. Nor can we do better, than often to enlarge on the petitions before us; whether we are praying for ourselves, or our fellow-Christians. We should desire, and ardently long, that "the Lord would grant unto us, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit" in all the graces of "the inner man;" (Note, Rom. 7:22—25.) that our hearts may be made the throne and temple of the Lord Jesus; that, in the daily exercise of faith, we may realize his gracious presence, experience his sanctifying consolations, and become more entirely devoted to his service; that, being "rooted and grounded in love" to him, his people, and his cause, we may be made "fruitful in every good work," and bold in professing our faith in him; that thus we may understand, experience, and enjoy more of his boundless love which passeth all comprehension, and will be more and more discovered and adored to all eternity; and that so at length "we may be filled unto all the fulness of God," being perfected for ever in knowledge, holiness, and felicity. In asking for such enlarged blessings, for ourselves and for all our brethren, we should not be straitened in our own minds; as we are not in our gracious God. He "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we" ever yet asked or thought, or ever shall be able to ask or think as long as we live in this world. Let us then enlarge our expectations and multiply our supplications; encouraged by what he has already done for his church, and by his regenerating and upholding our souls: being assured that the conversion of sinners, and the increasing light, holiness, and comfort of believers, will redound, in more abundant adorations and thanksgivings, to his "glory by Christ Jesus," in his whole church, and to all the ages of eternity. Amen, so be it. Let thy name, O Lord, be thus hallowed on earth, as it is, and ever shall be, in thy holy habitation above! (Notes, Matt. 6: 9,10,13. Rev. 5:8—14. 19:1—6.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—6. (Note, 3:1—7, v. 1.) The apostle, as "a prisoner of the Lord," for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, exhorted and entreated his Ephesian brethren, whose best interests lay near his heart, to take peculiar care, that their habitual conduct, in the world and among themselves, might be worthy of their high "vocation." The privileges and prospects, to which the grace of God had called them, from a state of abject idolatry, ignorance, and vice; (Notes, 2:11—22.) the obligations conferred on them; the plain and full instructions; the motives and encouragements afforded them; and every thing in the doctrine and love of Christ, as well as the nature of their future inheritance, required of them a peculiar temper and conduct; which he was about to point out to them in various particulars. (Marg. Ref. a, b, d. Notes, Phil. 1:27—30. 1 Thes. 2:9—12.) Especially, he must exhort them to behave with "humility" and self-abasement, without self-preference, boasting, emulation, or contempt of others; and with "meekness," gentleness, and "long-suffering," even amidst great insults and injuries; as well as with a disposition to "forbear one another in love," as to those light occasions of offence or displeasure, which could not be wholly avoided even among believers, in their present imperfect state. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, 30—32. Matt. 18:15—17. John 13:31—35. Gal. 5:13—15. Phil. 2:1—4. Col. 3:12—15.) Thus they ought studiously and diligently to follow after peace and harmony with each other, according to the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit; whose dwelling in all their hearts united them as Christians, and should induce them to live together, as bound in the closest amity and the nearest of all relations; notwithstanding difference of sentiment in some respects, and the manifold defects which they discerned in one another; and would be conscious of in themselves, if they carefully watched their own hearts. (Marg. Ref. g.) For, in truth the whole church was "one Body," of which every believer was a member, and "Christ the Head:" this body was animated, as it were, by one life or soul, even the omnipresent Spirit of Christ: (Notes, Rom. 12:3—5. 1 Cor. 12:15—26.) all believers were called to "one hope" of the same eternal happiness, on the same ground of the word of God, warranted by the same experience of his converting and sanctifying grace. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Col. 1: 25—27. 2 Thes. 2:16,17. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 3:13—16. 1 John 3:1—3.) They had all "one Lord," Mediator, Protector, and Judge, under whom they had their several employments allotted to them. (Note, 1 Cor. 8:4—6.) They had all "one faith," both as to its Object, Author, nature, and efficacy; and they all believed the same doctrines in the great essentials of religion. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) They had all been admitted into the church, by "one baptism" with water, "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," as the sign of regeneration and the outward seal of the new covenant. (Marg. Ref. n. Note, Matt. 28: 19,20.) Thus they were all, whether Jews or Gentiles, become the worshippers of "one God," even "the Father" of all; who was infinitely above, and absolute Ruler over all creatures; who pervaded and sustained all, and acted by all as his instruments; and who was indeed in them all, through Christ, and by his Spirit, being personally distinct from the Son, and the Holy Ghost, yet mysteriously one with them. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, John 14:21—24. 17:22,23. Rom. 11:33—36, v. 36. Col. 3:7—11.) They had therefore every possible motive to live in love and peace, as being united in so many important and endearing particulars. All divisions and discords, in these circumstances, must be peculiarly incongruous; yet the remains of in-dwelling sin, of pride, self-wisdom, self-will, ambition, resentment, with the devices of false brethren, and the stratagems of Satan, would tend to disunion: and it would require their most prudent and strenuous endeavours, to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:10—16. 13:4—7.)—'I must be owned, as a certain truth, that nothing can unite us to that church, and Body, of which Christ is the Head, but the participation of the Spirit.' Whitby.

Body" before described, had freely conferred on every individual member gifts and grace, endowments, stations, and spiritual gifts, according to that "measure," by which, in his sovereign wisdom, he proportioned his bountiful communications to the wants and circumstances of his saints. This, therefore, every one ought thankfully to receive, and quietly to employ for the benefit of the whole, without envying, coveting, or disputing. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, Matt. 25: 14—18. Rom. 12:6—8. 1 Cor. 12:4—11. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) With relation to this subject, the Lord had spoken, by the Psalmist, concerning the victories and exaltation of the Messiah; that when he "ascended up on high, and led captivity captive," even those enemies who had enslaved the human race, he "received gifts for men," "even for the rebellious;" that through the imparting of these gifts, the LORD God might dwell among them. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Note, Ps. 68: 18.) Now if JEHOVAH (who was there evidently spoken of) "ascended," what does this imply, but that he previously "descended into these lower parts of the earth?" So that the incarnation, abasement, death, and burial of Emmanuel, previous to his resurrection and ascension, were most clearly pointed out by the prophet. (Notes, John 3:12—15. 16:25—30.) He, who thus descended and abased himself, was the very same Person who also "ascended up far above all heavens," as placed over all the inhabitants of them; that he might fulfil all things relative to his mediatorial undertaking; that from his fulness he might fill his church, his ministers, and all believers, with his abundant gifts and graces; and that he might fill heaven and earth with his glory. (Note, 1:15—23, v. 23.) When he ascended, &c. (8) Not from the LXX; yet it varies from the Hebrew. (Ps. 68:18.) The Psalmist says, "He hath received gifts for men:" the apostle, "He gave gifts to men."—He received that he might give.—But of whom could he "receive gifts for men?" He, whose name is Emmanuel, received, at his ascension, from the Father, those gifts which he conferred on men, his brethren. The death and burial of Christ, as well as his incarnation, seem to be intended.

V. 11—13. Christ, having been exalted to his glory in heaven, first plenteously poured out the Holy Spirit on his chosen "apostles," as his invaluable "gifts to men;" that, through their ministry, and by the laying on of their hands, sinful men might be made partakers of his salvation, and of abundant spiritual gifts and miraculous powers: and that, from them, as the grand repository, the church, in all future ages, might receive all divine truth; especially by those sacred oracles which were written by them, and under their inspection, to be the standard of Christianity. He next qualified and raised up "prophets," or extraordinary teachers endued with the gift of prophecy, and acting in subordination to the apostles, in making known his gospel in the world; others he qualified to be "evangelists," to preach from city to city, as assistants to the apostles, and observing their directions. He also qualified and appointed stated "pastors and teachers" in the different churches, to carry on the work begun by the apostles and evangelists. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, Matt. 16:19. Mark 16:14—18. John 20:19—23. 1 Cor. 12:27—31.) Thus the ascended Saviour, by sending forth able and faithful ministers, "gave gifts unto men," as through their labours he communicated "the Spirit of life and holiness" to mankind. This appointment was intended for "the perfecting of the saints" in knowledge and holiness, and for increasing their numbers; or, for "the perfecting of holy persons, to perform the work of the ministry" from age to age, for edifying, or building up, the spiritual temple, by bringing sinners, through faith, to be built on the true Foundation; (Note, 2:19—22.) and by increasing the fitness of believers for their several stations in the church; in order to the beauty, harmony, and proportion of the whole. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) The same grand design might also be illustrated, by considering the church as "the Body of Christ:". (Marg. Ref. l. Note 1 Cor. 12:15—26.) for it was intended by these gifts to nourish and mature that Body, till all believers were brought to that unity of faith, and agreement in doctrine, and that spiritual and experimental knowledge of the Son of God, in his Person, glory, and salvation, producing love, confidence, obedience, and conformity; which would render the whole "a perfect man," complete in every member, sense, and organ, and all grown up to maturity; according to that measure of capacity, gifts, and grace, which Christ allotted to every individual, in order to the proportion of the stature of his mystical body, "the fulness of him who filleth all in all:" that so the church on earth might, in each successive generation, bear some resemblance to the whole company, when being perfected in number, knowledge, holiness, union, and felicity, they shall meet together in heaven. (Marg. Ref. m—p.)—Evangelists. (11) 'Under this name they are to be understood, whom the apostles used as their attendants, in performing their office; because they were not sufficient for every thing. ... Of this kind were Timothy, Titus, Silvanus, Apollos, whom Paul joined with himself in the inscription of the epistles, yet so as to call himself alone an apostle. This office therefore was only temporary.' Beza. The opinion of this venerable Reformer, in the last clause, seems not well founded. The office of "Evangelists" in the primitive times, was in most respects, similar to that of missionaries, in subsequent times. They were preachers of the gospel, without full apostolical authority, and without any stated charge; going among the heathen to found churches; while the apostles lived, under their personal direction; and afterwards according to their doctrine and methods of proceeding: or, visiting the churches already planted, "to set in order such things as were wanting," to supply the deficiencies, or aid the labours, of stated pastors; and to stimulate them to greater earnestness in discharging their duty. When zeal for propogating the gospel subsided, this office sunk into disuse; and thus for ages, the heathen have been in a great measure neglected: and it seems to have been one grand defect at the Reformation, that no part of the funds, which had been appropriated to religious purposes, was reserved for the special object of supporting evangelists to the heathen world: but in one form or other the office of "evangelist," or something of the same nature, must revive, along with the spirit of evangelizing the nations. 'These, when they' (the persons above mentioned) 'were employed in preaching the gospel to those who had not yet received it, the Scripture calls Evangelists.' Hammond. (Notes, Acts 21:7—14. 2 Tim. 4:1—5.)—It might have previously been expected in the present lamentably divided state of the church, that the zealots of each division would find out their own plan of church-government, and their own orders of ministers, exclusively, in this passage: but it is probable, that none of them would be satisfied with so general a statement, were they called to write their sentiments on the subject.—It appears to me, that "bishops," however the word may be understood, are included under the general terms, "pastors and teachers," as the principal resident rulers and teachers of the church. (Notes, Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1. Rev. 2:1.)—Were diocesan bishops more constantly resident, and more "instant in preaching the word," as well as in ruling the flock as "shepherds," their authority would be more reverenced, and their usefulness allowed. (Note, John 21:15—17.)

V. 14—16. The whole plan before mentioned was formed, in order that believers should no longer be (as many had been and were) "like children" in knowledge and experience (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—3. 14:20—25. Heb. 5:11—14.) and so, through instability, want of judgment, and weakness of faith, liable to "be tossed to and fro," as ships without ballast, by the waves of the sea: or "carried about" like clouds with the wind, by the false and pernicious doctrines which subtle and ingenious men devised; and by the plausible reasonings and pretences, with which they propagated them: as, in this manner, Satan's ministers waited by the way for the professors of the gospel, to deceive and pervert them, for their own ambitious and selfish purposes. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Cor. 11:13—15. 2 Pet. 2:17. Jude 11—13.) To prevent the divisions, scandals, and delusions, arising from the cunning craftiness of deceivers, and the unsuspecting credulity of weak Christians; the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, had been appointed; and every believer had his measure of spiritual gifts and talents bestowed on him, that he might improve it, to promote the purity, peace, and edification of the church. Thus all Christians, as well as ministers, being taught to "hold," or "maintain, the truth in love;" uprightly professing and defending the great truths of the gospel, in meekness towards all men and love of each other, "might grow up in all things" to a nearer communion with Christ, and conformity to him, by influence derived from him, and by observing his directions: as members in that Body, of which he is the Head, from whom the whole receives all its life, vigour, and spiritual health. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) And being fitly proportioned, and closely united, through the gifts, grace, and services of each individual, and with the "effectual operation" of Christ by his Spirit, according to his appointed measure in every part; continual increase might be made to it, both by the conversion of sinners, and the sanctification of believers: and the whole be edified, united, adorned, and advanced, in love of Christ, and of every one to the others, with all the happy effects and fruits of love. In this respect the church would resemble the human body, which consists of various members, united by joints and ligaments: each part being proportioned to its place, and fitted for its use; the whole being compacted, by the nerves, arteries, veins, and the circulations continually carrying on, from the head and the heart, through every part of the whole. Thus it grows up from infancy to manhood, and is preserved in vigour and activity; while every part performs its proper function, in union with the head, in perfect harmony with all the rest, and for the common good. (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—This shows the intent, tendency, and duties of the several stations of Christians in the church; and if these were more attended to, the resemblance would be more manifest, and the effects unspeakably beneficial. (Notes, Rom. 12:3—5. 1 Cor. 12:12—31. Col. 2:18,19.)

V. 17—19. In order that the Christians at Ephesus might "by love serve one another," the apostle next called on them, not only as a friendly monitor, but as "testifying" to them and charging them in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus; that they should not "henceforth," after having professed the gospel, conduct themselves in the same manner that the rest of the Gentiles did; but should manifest such a distinction of temper and behaviour, as became their vocation. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, 5:8—14. Rom. 1:18—32. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. 1 Pet. 4:1—5.) For the Gentiles with whom they were surrounded, "walked in the vanity of their mind;" and their vain speculations and carnal affections concurred in influencing them to choose and pursue worldly vanities, as their chief good; which was the natural effect of their vain idolatry. Their "understanding was darkened," through pride, prejudices, and lusts, and by the agency of Satan; (Notes, Acts 26:16—18. 2 Cor. 4:3,4.) so that they were wholly averse to that life of spiritual obedience, which God requires and communicates, which accords to his own nature and felicity, and is the beginning and preparation for heavenly joys. This "alienation from the life of God," was the effect of their "ignorance" in every thing relating to true religion; and that ignorance arose, not so much for want of capacity, or of means of information alone, as from "the blindness of their hearts," and the obstinate depravity of their affections. (Marg. Ref. i—m.) Thus they stupified themselves with false principles, corrupting fables, and habitual excesses, till they lost all "feeling" of conscience, and sense of propriety, decency, and morality; (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) and so gave themselves up to the unrestrained indulgence of their sensual inclinations, by the greedy commission of the most unnatural and detestable uncleanness; as if their highest happiness had consisted in these far worse than brutal practices. V. 20—24. The Ephesians "had not so learned Christ," or that religion, of which Christ is both the Teacher and the Instruction, the centre of all doctrines, promises, ordinances, and duties; as to live after the manner of their heathen neighbours. (Marg. Ref. q. Note, 2 Cor. 3:17,18.) Some, indeed, had "learned Christ" from teachers, who paid little regard to practice; but the Ephesian church had been better instructed; "seeing" they had heard Christ himself, as it were, speak by his apostle, and had been thus "taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus;" laid up in him, as in a treasury, to be communicated from him to his church through his word and ordinances: or "if so be they had been taught" by him; that is, by his Spirit as well as by his ministers. (Marg. Ref. r, s.) For indeed, "the truth as it is in Jesus" taught men, that they must "put off," in respect of the whole of their former conversation and behaviour, "the old man," or that sinful nature, which they derived from fallen Adam, and which is corrupt in all its principles and affections, according to those various inordinate desires of worldly things, which mock men's expectations deceive their souls, and make them deceivers of each other; and which may therefore be called "deceitful lusts," or "lusts of deceit." (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, Prov. 11:18. Rom. 7:9—12. Heb. 3:7—13.) The outward conduct, resulting from the corrupt nature, must be cast off

(Notes, Rom. 6:5—7. Col. 3:7—11.)—The Ephesians had also been taught, according "as the truth is in Jesus," that they must be continually "renewed" more and more, in the inward judgment, motives, and affections of their souls, by the power of divine grace, into the humble, spiritual, holy, and loving mind of Christ: that so they might "put on the new man;" and that their habitual conduct might be conformed to his example, and evince that they were "new created," after the image of God, "in righteousness and true holiness," or, "the holiness of truth," that is, evangelical holiness, even that holiness which springs from a real belief of "the truth in Jesus," consists in uprightness towards God and man, and produces true and genuine peace and satisfaction. (Marg. Ref. z—d. Notes, Gen. 1:26,27. Ps. 51:10. Rom. 12:1,2. 13:11—14. Tit. 2: 11,12.) These important and essential practical lessons they had been taught by the apostle, and by Christ himself, if indeed they were true Christians: and in connexion with the means, motives, and assistances afforded them, they would effectually lead them to a conduct, entirely different from that of their Gentile neighbours.—The "corrupt conversation," including doubtless the bad habits of the heathen, is distinguished from "the old man," or the depraved nature, whence all these evils spring. The root would still remain, after the converts had "put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man;" and this would render watchfulness and diligence needful to the end, till "the body of sin should be abolished." (Notes, Jam. 1:19—21. 1 Pet. 1:13—21. 2:1—3.) If "the old man," means no more than bad habits, as many explain it; how does it come to pass, that these bad habits have always been so general, not to say universal; while good habits, have been exceedingly rare, if any instances can be adduced, which never yet have been, in a satisfactory manner? We never read of bad habits, in any degree, among holy angels: nor would they have been heard of among men, if they had not apostatized from God, and become "dead in sin," and "by nature children of wrath." (Note, 2:1—3.)—The state of the unconverted Gentiles is indeed here particularly adverted to: yet it is most certain, that the nature of the unregenerate (nay, their practice also, except in respect of gross idolatry, and some of its abominable appendages,) is similar, even in those who are called Christians.

V. 25. Let the Ephesian Christians then show, that they had "put off the old man with his deeds," by "putting off" every kind of falsehood and deceit: let them no longer flatter, slander, defraud, amuse, or compliment others by any deviation from strict veracity and sincerity: but let every one of them speak the simple truth to his neighbour, without disguise, prevarication, simulation or dissimulation: seeing that men, both in the church, and in civil society, are "members one of another;" as all men are one in Adam, and all believers one in Christ. They ought not therefore in any way to deceive each other: but should think it as unnatural and preposterous to impose on one another, as for a schism to take place in the body, or for one sense or member of the body to delude or mislead another into mischief, to the common detriment of the whole.—'Dr. Whitby hath well shown, in his note on this passage, that several of the best of the heathen moralists thought lying might in many cases be justified: and I wish that none but heathens had ever taught so loose and dangerous a doctrine.' Doddridge. (Note, Judg. 4:20.)

V. 26, 27. It would be proper to express displeasure at what was wrong, on many occasions, in the management of families, in reproving sin, and even in ordering their temporal concerns; so that all anger was not absolutely prohibited: (Note, Mark 3:1—5 & 5.) yet let Christians be very circumspect and vigilant to restrain that dangerous passion within the bounds of reason, meekness, piety, and charity; not being angry "without cause," or above cause, or in a proud, selfish, and peevish manner; not expressing their displeasure by reproaches, or the language of vehement indignation; or suffering it to settle into resentment and malice: but always endeavouring to subordinate the exercise of it to the glory of God, and the benefit of the offender himself, as well as that of others; and to show stronger disapprobation of the sin committed against God, than of the injury done to themselves. (Marg. Ref. k. Note, Matt. 5:21,22.) This would induce them to attend to the caution annexed, "Let not the sun go down upon their wrath," and not to close the day without forgiving and praying for those who had offended them, or expressing a disposition to reconciliation and kindness. In this and in other respects, they must take peculiar care, not "to give place to the devil," who watched his opportunity of filling their minds with rancour and malice, and of thus exciting divisions and contentions among them. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, 30—32. Ex. 20:13. 1 Sam. 2:23—25,29. 3:13. Prov. 14:17,29. 17:14. 19:11. Matt. 5:21,22. Jam. 1:19—21. 3:17, 18.)—The words, "Be ye angry and sin not," are taken from the LXX, (Ps. 4:4.) which is rendered in our version, "Stand in awe, and sin not."—Neither give place, &c. (27) Notes, Matt. 27:3—5. John 13:18—30. Acts 5:1—11. Jam. 4:7—10. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.

V. 28. It might also be supposed, that, while the Ephesians were idolaters, many of them had practised various kinds of fraud and dishonesty, and indeed that some had even lived by theft, rapine, or oppression. (Note, Ex. 20:15.) These might not, in many cases, be able to make restitution, which, if they had it in their power, ought by all means to be done: (Notes and P. O. 1—6. Notes, Lev. 6:2—7. Num. 5:7,8. Luke 19:1—10.) but, at least, let every one finally cease from all kinds and degrees of this vice: and rather than do wrong to any man in any respect, let each of them, however he had before lived in habits of ease and self-indulgence, learn and submit to, if necessary, even the lowest and most laborious employment, which was honest and useful to society; not only in order to provide food and raiment for himself and his family, but that he might be able to relieve the more urgent necessities of his sick and afflicted brethren and neighbours. (Notes, Acts 20:22—35. 1 Thes. 4:6—12. 2 Thes. 3:10—12.) Thus their Christian conduct would be as honourable, as their former behaviour had been disgraceful. In this way, even the grand principle of restitution (namely, renouncing all right to property, which has been injuriously acquired,) would be adhered to, as far as their circumstances admitted of it; and a fund raised, among the vigorous and healthy poor, for the relief of the sick and aged.—Great stress seems in many places to be laid on this; which, in a very striking manner, shows to what an extent charitable communications, from the substance or gains of Christians, in every station of life, for the relief of their brethren, and of others for Christ's sake, ought to be carried. (Marg. Ref.) But alas! those who are not eager to amass wealth, as most in these days are, spend very far too much on themselves and their families, to spare a due proportion for beneficent purposes: and a degree of liberality, even far beneath the scriptural and primitive standard, is now regarded rather as a prodigy to be wondered at, than an example to be imitated. (Notes, Acts 2:44—47. 9:36—43. P. O. 32—43. Notes, 11:27—30.)

To give.] "To distribute." Marg. Μεταδιδοναι. Luke 3:11. Rom. 1:11. 12:8. 1 Thes. 2:8.

V. 29. The apostle furthermore exhorted his readers to abstain from all corrupt and polluting conversation, and not to suffer a single thought of that contagious nature, which arose in their hearts, to proceed out of their lips; as this would poison the imaginations of the hearers, even when not so grossly indecent as to shock them; and often the more so, on that very account. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, 5:3,4. Ex. 20: 14. Matt. 12:33—37. Col. 3:7—11. Jam. 3:3—12.) On the contrary, they ought to watch their opportunity of introducing every kind of salutary and instructive discourse; and to take heed, that the general tendency of their conversation was good, useful, and edifying; even such as might be the means of communicating grace to the hearers, by the blessing of God upon it either by bringing careless persons to use of edifying, that it may [t]minister grace unto the hearers.

30 And [u]grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, [x]whereby ye are sealed unto [y]the day of redemption.

31 Let all [z]bitterness, [a]and wrath, and anger, and [b]clamour, and [c]evil speaking, be put away from you, [d]with all malice:

32 And be ye [e]kind one to another, [f]tender-hearted, [g]forgiving one another even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

V. 30—32. In respect of the things above stated, and in all other respects, Christians should beware of "grieving the Holy Spirit of God."—'Give diligence, that the Holy Spirit may dwell in you willingly, as in a pleasant and agreeable habitation, and do not give him any cause for grief. He speaks here of the Spirit after the manner of men.' Beza. When a father has done every thing proper for the benefit of his son, he "is grieved" if his son acts in an unbecoming manner; and, consequently, will not be free and cheerful in his company; but will either shun him, or frown on him. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, Gen. 6:6,7. Ps. 95:9—11. Is. 63:10. Acts 7:51—53. 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 19.)—The sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit "seal" believers, as the peculiar people of God, "to the day of redemption," even to the general resurrection. (Marg Ref. x, y. Notes, 1:13, 14. Rom. 8:18—23. 2 Cor. 1:21,22.) As a kind and wise Friend, the Holy Spirit watched over the Ephesian converts for their good, with infinite condescension and love: all their hope, wisdom, strength, and joy, were from him; and the only return which he required, was a ready compliance with his holy suggestions, and a watchfulness against every thing of a contrary tendency. But if they yielded to anger, malice, selfishness, deceit, or sensual lusts; or used vain conversation, or yielded to negligence and unwatchfulness, as to the means of grace, or the duties of their respective stations; he would hide his face, or frown upon them, withhold his consolations, and leave them to darkness, fears, and anxieties; or even to know their own weakness by such falls as would expose them to sharp corrections.—In watching against these painful consequences, let them put away "all bitterness," and harshness of temper, language, and behaviour, even toward such as most grievously offended them; and avoid all sinful anger and clamorous disputes, revilings, slanders, and reproaches, as well as all malice and resentment: that they might be kind and tenderly sympathizing with each other, and ready to forgive, even as "God in Christ," through his atonement and mediation, and for his sake, had forgiven them. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. "The mind that was in Christ" will teach those who suffer for his sake, to be more desirous that Christians, and those especially with whom they are peculiarly connected, should "walk worthy of their vocation," than of their own exemption from the cross: and though we can do nothing towards our own justification; yet, by the grace of God, we may do a great deal for the honour of the gospel, and the benefit of mankind.—A spiritual, humble, obedient, and holy walk, is peculiarly suitable to the character of our Saviour, and to the freeness and abundant grace of our salvation; as well as to the nature of our present privileges and future inheritance. Even the candour and allowance, which we are conscious of needing from our brethren, should teach us to act "with all lowliness and meekness; with long suffering, forbearing one another in love." If all who profess the gospel did indeed thus "endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," what a different face would the church of God assume! But alas! while there is "one Body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father of all," on whom all depend, and from whom all our hopes and comforts come; how grievously do the remaining ignorance, bigotry, and disproportionate zeal about comparative trifles, even in good men; the designing ambition and furious passions of bad men; and the artifices of the devil, defeat the endeavours of those who labour for peace; and perpetuate, yea multiply, divisions and dissnesions among those who are agreed in the great essentials of Christianity! Let us, however, persevere in seeking and praying for the peace of the church: for "blessed are the peacemakers:" and, whatever eager zealots may say of us, we shall, in so doing, "be called the children of God." (Note, Matt. 5:9.) Let us watch and pray against spiritual pride, self-preference, vainglory, envy, and the ambition of popularity and precedence, and selfishness in every form; for these are the grand sources of discord and contention.

V. 7—16. We should severally improve our measure of endowment, as "the gift of Christ," for the benefit of others, with contentment and quietness: and it may be very instructive and encouraging to remember, that the Redeemer first came down from heaven, and abased himself, before he ascended as a triumphant Conqueror, to enrich us rebels with the fruits of his victories. Thus he "left us an example that we should follow his steps:" and expect abasement, self-denial, and the cross here; and honour and felicity hereafter.—While Christians should be exhorted to value the faithful ministry of the gospel, as the precious gift of Christ, and the principal means of salvation to their souls; "pastors and teachers," however distinguished, should be reminded of the grand purpose for which they were appointed, even "for the perfecting of the saints, and for the work of the ministry," and not for the emolument or reputation or rank in society connected with it; and for the edification of the body of Christ, not for the indulgence of themselves, or the advancement of their families to wealth or preferment, with the treasures or patronage intrusted to their stewardships, that with them they may promote the cause of true religion, and of which stewardship they must at length give a strict account. We should then "take heed to ourselves and to our doctrine," and labour to bring those among whom we minister, to "the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God," and to that maturity of judgment and experience, which may fit them to be a part of that complete Body, "according to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." For, by leading believers, with gradual advances, to this ripeness of knowledge; we most effectually counteract "the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness by which they lie in wait to deceive:" as their success is chiefly among unstable professors, or those Christians who, being "children in understanding," are liable to be "tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine," and by every subtle device of the enemy. (Note, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Pet. 2:12—14.)—We should indeed "hold the truth with firmness," but it should also be "in love:" otherwise zeal for orthodoxy may dictate such violent measures, as shall more distract the church, and injure the cause of Christ, than false teachers themselves could do. But by "faith which worketh by love," we "grow up into Christ in all things," and, acting in a believing and loving spirit, every minister and Christian, as a part of that Body of which Christ is the Head, contributes to the proportion, union, and prosperity of the whole, "according to his effectual working in every part." Thus the church is increased in holiness and in numbers, "by edifying itself in love." (Note, Acts 9:31.) Indeed, every congregation, where the truth is preached, will prosper and increase, according to the measure in which this peaceful and loving improvement of every one's talents, for the common benefit, is attended to: for "the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace;" but "where envying and strife are, there is confusion and every evil work." (Notes, Jam. 1:19—21. 3:13—18. P. O.)

V. 17—24. Let all ministers "testify in the Lord," with all solemnity and authority, against unchristian tempers and practices, as well as against false doctrines; and insist upon it, that believers must not "walk as others do," who are Gentiles in conduct, though Christians in name: for the difference between heretofore and "henceforth," is of immense importance in this grand concern. (Notes and P. O. 1 Pet.

CHAPTER V.

The apostle exhorts the Ephesians to imitate the love of God in Christ, 1, 2, to avoid all uncleanness, covetousness, and improper discourse, which draw down the wrath of God upon "the children of disobedience," 3—6; to have "no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;" but, as the "children of light," to reprove them, 7—14; to walk with wisdom and circumspection, 15—17; not to seek exhilaration by excess of wine, but to "be filled with the Spirit," speaking and singing Psalms and praises to God, 18—20; and to submit to one another, in the several relations of life, 21. The duties of wives and husbands enforced and illustrated, by the mutual love of Christ and his church, 22—33.

BE ye therefore [a]followers of God [b]as dear children;

2 And [c]walk in love, [d]as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us an offering and [e]a sacrifice to God [f]for a sweet-smelling savour.

3 But [g]fornication, and all uncleanness, or [h]covetousness, let it not be once [i]named among you, [k]as becometh saints;

4:1—6.) Alas! do not men on every side, though called Christians, "walk in the vanity of their minds?" Is it not plain, that "their understandings are darkened," and their hearts "alienated from the life of God," and even hardened against it, "through the ignorance that is in them?" Nay, are there not numbers, who "are past feeling, and have given themselves over to work all uncleanness with greediness?" Must we not then insist, most decidedly, upon the distinction between real and nominal Christians? Indeed, there are many professors of evangelical truth, who have so perversely received the gospel, as not to be convinced of the necessity of mortifying their corrupt nature and its deceitful lusts, of being "renewed in the spirit of their minds," and of "putting on the new man, which is created after God in righteousness and true holiness!" But, if we have truly "learned Christ," from the teaching of his Holy Spirit, accompanying and blessing the word of God to our souls; we shall be daily aiming to practise these instructions, seeking help from God by fervent prayer: we shall mourn, that so much power yet remains in our old corrupt nature, and we shall long to be rendered day by day more like our divine Master, in every part of our spirit and conduct towards God and man.

V. 25—32. Zealous professors and admired preachers of evangelical truth; nay, even true Christians, need warning and cautioning to avoid immoral practices: but the upright welcome and profit by the word of exhortation: while hypocrites detect themselves by raging against it, or disdaining it. —Those who most carefully watch over and examine themselves, will most clearly perceive the extreme difficulty of adhering to exact "truth" and sincerity in all their conversation, and of avoiding every kind and degree of falsehood: they also find it very difficult to feel and express anger, on the most justifiable occasions, and to perform the duties of parents, masters, or ministers, without falling into sin, and dishonouring their profession. They perceive it very necessary to watch and pray against resentment; lest "the sun should go down upon their wrath," and so place should be given for Satan to tempt them to further transgressions: for, in every thing, the occasions of his suggestions should be most vigilantly and assiduously avoided.—Even exact and scrupulous honesty in all things is far more uncommon than is generally imagined; nay, many truly pious persons do things not strictly just, for want of being instructed and admonished after the apostolical manner. But though thieves and robbers are as welcome, when they come to the Saviour by penitent faith, as their more moral neighbours; yet, thenceforth they must "steal no more," whatever hard labour may be necessary for a mean, frugal, and honest livelihood. What then shall we think of those professed Christians, who grow rich and live in luxury, by various frauds and oppressions, by excessive profits, by smuggling and other acts of injustice, without restitution or amendment! And if the poor labourer ought to "give to him that needeth;" what shall we think of those, whose large revenues, and immense expenses or hoardings, are far out of all proportion to their penurious and scanty alms?—If we would act according to our obligations as Christians, our discourse also must be kept pure, our tongues bridled, and the gift of speech diligently improved as a talent; that so we may not, with this "unruly member," do mischief to others; but may speak such pious and instructive words, as are suited "to minister grace to the hearers." When we in any degree or respect neglect these rules, we "grieve the Holy Spirit of God," lose our comfort and evidence, and even bring our state into doubt and suspicion. Let us then watch against all the evils here stated, and against all anger and malice, and every violent and malignant temper; and in all things copy diligently the loving example of our God and Saviour.

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. (Note, 4:30—32.) Instead of the violent and malignant passions, mentioned at the close of the preceding chapter, the believers at Ephesus were exhorted to "follow," or imitate, God, as his beloved children, in all his moral perfections, especially in that love from which their salvation flowed. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) This might best be contemplated in the person and love of Christ, who had assumed human nature, and "given himself for them an offering or sacrifice to God;" which was to him "a sweet-smelling savour," in allusion to the typical sacrifices consumed on the altar. (Marg. Ref. f. Note, Gen. 8:20—22.) Not that the Father could take pleasure in beholding the intense sufferings "of his beloved Son," in whom "his soul delighted," on their own account: but his justice and holiness were thus glorified, and a way was opened for the honourable exercise of mercy towards those who deserved his awful vengeance; and in this display of his glory he was well pleased. The Father showed his love and mercy to us, in "not sparing his own Son, but delivering him up for us all;" and the Son manifested his love to us, by "giving himself for us." And to be "followers of God," is to "walk in love, as Christ hath loved us:" for, says he, "I and the Father are One." (Marg. Ref. c—e.)—Compassion for the deservedly miserable, condescension to the mean and vile, a readiness to forgive injuries, self-abasement, self-denial, and enlarged beneficence, all in full perfection, were most illustriously manifested in that love, which is here proposed as the pattern for our imitation. (Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. John 13:12—17,31—35. Phil. 1:1—6. 1 John 3:1—3,16,17. 4:7—12.)

V. 3, 4. The apostle had, in the foregoing chapter, warned the Ephesians against several of those immoralities, to which they had been addicted before their conversion: and he here resumes that subject. (Notes, 4:25—29.) The degree, in which "fornication" in particular, and other kinds of licentiousness, were practised and even allowed, nay, excused or vindicated, not only by poets, but even by grave philosophers of the Gentiles, can hardly be conceived by those who are not conversant with their writings. The exhortation, therefore, as it respects these vices, needs little comment: but many learned men maintain, that the word rendered "covetousness," means an insatiable craving after more and more of these sensual indulgences. Now, it cannot be denied that the word sometimes has that sense, yet it can hardly be supposed, that the apostle would, in so general a way, have added to his warning against fornication, the mention of that "uncleanness with greediness," which he before had stated, as the excess of Pagan blindness and hardness of heart. (Note, 4:17—19.) On the other hand, can it be thought that "covetousness" should here, and in all other exhortations of a similar nature, which the apostle addressed to the churches, be almost if not entirely overlooked? For those who explain the word in this text, of greediness in lewdness, put the same construction on it in many other places where it occurs.—No doubt "covetousness," or the eager desire of gain, whether to hoard, or to support extravagance, is as contrary to vital Christianity, as the grossest sensualities; though more plausible and not so easily defined. It also supplies the means, in many cases, of silencing or softening the reproofs of those who would firmly protest against "fornication," and even prosecute the offenders with the censures of the church.—The clause, "Let it not once be named, &c." may only mean, 'Let it not be said, that a Christian is guilty of such crimes.' But, if understood of the discourse, in which the "naming" licentious practices, in a manner too common, tends to pollute the imaginations, or inflame the passions of the hearers, it cannot be doubted, that the conversation of those who speak as if every thing was valuable in proportion as money can be got or saved by it, corrupts the judgment and principles of men, though in another way, yet as effectually as obscene discourse. It seems also to be with peculiar propriety, that the apostle joined this odious vice with these others more generally scandalous. (Notes, Col. 3:5,6. 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) Neither the one, nor the other, should be mentioned without detestation; for this "became," or suited their character as saints, and their relation to God as his children, as members of Christ, as temples of the Holy Spirit, as heirs of heaven, and as lights of the world. Nay, they must not allow of any indecent conversation, or any thing vain and trifling; or even of those witty turns of expression, by which improper sentiments, being conveyed in an ingenious manner, obtain applause, instead of exciting indignation, and poison the mind more unsuspectedly

5 For [o]this ye know, [p]that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, [q]who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God.

8 For [y]ye were sometime darkness, [z]but now are ye light in the Lord: [a]walk as children of light;

9 (For [b]the fruit of the Spirit is in all [c]goodness, and [d]righteousness, and [e]truth;)

10 [f]Proving what is [g]acceptable unto the Lord.

11 And have [h]no fellowship with the [i]unfruitful [k]works of darkness, [l]but rather reprove them.

12 For [m]it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them [n]in secret.

13 But all things that are [t]reproved are made manifest by the light: [e]for whatsoever doth make manifest, is light.

14 Wherefore [h]he saith, [p]Awake, thou that sleepest, and [q]arise from the dead, [r]and Christ shall give thee light. [Practical Observations.]

V. 5—7. The apostle here supposed his readers to know, that "fornicators, unclean persons, and covetous men," were out of the way to heaven. "The covetous" though often more favoured than debauched characters, were, in the strictest sense, "idolaters;" seeing they loved, trusted, and expected happiness from wealth rather than from God; and sought to increase or secure their treasures, instead of seeking first his favour, image, and glory. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Ex. 20:3. Ps. 10:2—11. 1 Tim. 3:3. 6:6—10, vv. 9,10. Tit. 1:5—9. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. 2 Pet. 2:1—3,12—14.) They were not therefore truly converted; and, not being subjects of Christ's kingdom on earth, they could not be entitled to "inherit" his heavenly kingdom. Some might indeed argue against this declaration; and, palliating these evils, or amusing themselves with speculations on the mercy of God and the freeness of salvation, might persuade others, that they were not absolutely inconsistent with a state of acceptance. But let none suffer any man to "deceive them with vain words;" as these very crimes brought the wrath of God upon "the children of disobedience," or those who persisted in unbelief, impenitence, and the allowed practice of sin. (Note, 2:1,2.)—Indeed, "vain words" of various kinds, by which men deceive themselves and each other, might be adduced, did our limits permit. The common principles which prevail, in countries professing Christianity, among those who think themselves far removed from an Antinomian perversion of evangelical truth, dictate "vain words," which deceive vast multitudes: while they consider Christians as under a remedial law, which does not require that strictness, which the holy moral law of God does; that faith compensates for failures even in this relaxed obedience; and that they may safely indulge in such things, under the gospel, as they must not venture on, if they were "under the law."—A smattering of vain philosophy also, united with these common notions, leads numbers to conclude, that God will not punish men for indulging their natural inclinations, however irregularly. Many popular writers, of late, have spoken of "fornication," and even the seduction of an unmarried woman, as no crime; or, merely as 'indulging the most amiable weakness of human nature!' In these, and in various other ways, ingenious men, and even philosophers, by 'moral essays,' (so called,) in modern times, deceive millions "with vain words;" and, no doubt, the grand deceiver of mankind had prophets of a similar stamp in ancient days. (Marg. Ref. r—t.)—When the most atrocious transgressors repent, and believe the gospel, they become "children of obedience," from whom the wrath of God is turned away: but it could not be expected, that he would punish the ignorant Gentiles for such abominations, and yet connive at them in professed Christians. (Note, 8—14.) If, therefore, those whom the apostle addressed, expected to escape the condemnation of their heathen neighbours, let them not partake of their crimes. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Gal. 5:19—21. Col. 3:5—11. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:14,15.)

V. 8—14. The Ephesians had once been "darkness" itself, through total ignorance of God and his will; (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, 2:11—13. Luke 1:76—79. Acts 26:16—18. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) but now, by the gospel, they were made "light in the Lord," as One with Christ, "the Light of the world." (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, John 1:4—9. 3:19—21. 8:12. 12:34—36.)—Let them therefore "walk as children of light;" like persons who were born again into the spiritual world, to be trained up as heirs of the light of heaven. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 1 Thes. 5:4—11. 1 Pet. 2:9—11.) If they were inwardly enlightened; the Holy Spirit, by whom the change had been wrought, would lead them to a suitable conversation: as "the fruit of the Spirit" consisted in all kinds of goodness, mercy, equity, integrity, veracity, sincerity, and faithfulness; as well as in uprightness in their professed faith fear, and love of God. (Marg. Ref. b—e. Note, Gal. 5 22—26) Let them then "prove," or make trial of, those things which God accepted and delighted in; and seek solid enjoyment in them. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Note, Rom. 12:2.) But let none of them countenance or join in those "works of darkness," from which worldly men sought pleasure and profit; but which were wholly "unfruitful," and yielded no present real advantage, to counterbalance in any degree the future ruin to which they led. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, Rom. 6:21—23, v. 21.) On the contrary, let them "reprove" such vices in their neighbours, by avowedly refusing to join in them, by protesting plainly against them, by showing their hateful nature and pernicious tendency; or by keeping a significant silence, when more explicit reproof might be unsuitable. For indeed it was "a shame even to speak of" the practices, which the heathens secretly committed; not only in taverns and brothels, but more especially in the most sacred mysteries of their abominable religion! (Marg. Ref. l—n. Note, 3,4. Rom. 1:24—27.) The light, however, of divine truth, held forth in an open profession, and a suitable walk and conversation, could not fail to detect and expose the detestable nature of such shameful practices. For whatever thus tended to make things manifest, according to their real nature, was "light," and equivalent in the spiritual world, to the light of the sun in the natural world. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, John 3:19—21.) With a view to this, according to the tenor of the Old Testament prophecies, (Marg. Ref. p. Note, Is. 60:1—3.) the Lord now called on sinners of the Gentiles to "awake" from the sleep of sin, and their vain dreams of worldly happiness; yea, to arise from "the death of sin;" and Christ would, by his doctrine and Spirit, give them sufficient light to discover and escape every danger, and to find the way of peace and holiness. (Marg Ref. q, r.)—Surely, this one text ought for ever to silence the vain speculations of those who, arguing from figurative expressions concerning the state of sinners as asleep, nay, "dead in sin," not only object to, but absolutely condemn as heresy, the most scriptural addresses, and calls on them to repent and turn to God, and believe in Christ and seek salvation!—Ye were darkness, &c. (8) What then is that 'light of nature,' of which some speak as sufficient, without the gospel, to lead the Gentiles to heaven?

V. 15—20. With these abundant advantages, the Ephesians ought to see to it, that they "walked accurately," well considering what conduct became them; or, "with exactness," according to the commands and example of Christ; keeping the direct way, "abstaining from all appearance of evil," and aiming at more complete obedience in every particular: and "circumspectly," cautiously looking at their paths to shun the snares laid in them; not acting as heedless, ignorant, or foolish persons, who rush into dangers, temptations, and mischief, but as "wise men," who are aware of them and escape them. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, Prov. 4:23—27.) As a great part of their lives had been wasted and grievously misemployed in heathen darkness, they ought also to improve their time for the future the more diligently, "redeeming," or buying it off from all avocations, at the expense of much self-denial and watchfulness; that they might spend it in religious exercises, or in doing good to others according to the duties of their stations, and as opportunities were given to them. For "the days were evil;" and the persecutions which awaited them, would render the term of their usefulness more precarious than in peaceful seasons; as they might be suddenly shut up in prison, or cut off by martyrdom: so that if they would secure their own salvation, or do good to mankind, no time was to be lost. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Ec. 9:10. John 9:4—7.) Let them not then be as "unwise" servants, who are not prepared for their Lord's coming, and are ignorant of their work: nay, let them spare no pains to understand "his will" concerning them; that they might serve him intelligently as well as zealously, and without giving their enemies any advantage against them. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Note, Phil. 1:9—11. Col. 1:9—14.) Instead of joining or imitating the revels of their neighbours, or seeking exhilaration by intemperate drinking, which induced a temporary insanity, and various disorders both of body and mind, and led to the most ruinous and mischievous conduct; let them wait on God in every appointed means, for larger communications of the Holy Spirit, whose sacred influences would fill their souls with satisfying consolation in every circumstance, and tend to the happiest consequences in future; and in which there was no danger of excess. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) In order to this, they should substitute, in the place of the loose odes and songs of the Gentiles, or other frivolous conversation, the "psalms and hymns" of the sacred Scripture, and such "spiritual songs" as pious men composed, on the peculiar subjects of the gospel, and according to the doctrine of truth. In these they should "speak to themselves," or to each other: attending especially to the affections of their hearts; that the inward "melody" of holy love and gratitude unto the Lord, might unite with the outward melody of poetry and singing, when they used them in this manner, either alone or in social worship. (Marg. Ref. e—g.) It was incumbent on them also to "give thanks always," even in seasons of persecution and affliction: and "for all things," not excepting such as nature disrelished, being satisfied of their salutary tendency. Thus let them acknowledge their manifold obligations to God, even "the Father, "in the name of Christ," through whom alone blessings were bestowed on sinful creatures, and praises accepted from them (Notes, Acts 16:25—28. Col. 3:16,17.

V. 21. In order to "glorify God" and "adorn the gospel," it was requisite that Christians should "submit to one another," and to all who had authority, according to their different situations and relations in the church, the community, or the family, and the subordination established by the word or providence of God. This should be done, not so much from secular motives of propriety and expediency, as "in the fear of God," and from a reverential regard to his authority, his favour, and glory; which would obviate those multiplied excuses that might be made for the neglect of this submission, on account of the misconduct of superior relations, and on various other grounds. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 13:1—7. 1 Cor. 7:17—24. Tit. 3:1—3. 1 Pet. 2:12—25. 5:5—7.)

Submit.] Υποτασσομενοι. 22,24. 1:22. Luke 2:51. See on Rom. 8:7. The kind and compliant conduct of the superior relations may be enjoined in an indirect way; but it cannot be directly meant by this word. (Note, Ex. 20:12.)

V. 22—27. As a most important instance of that "submission to one another in the fear of God," the apostle exhorted "wives to submit themselves to their own husbands;" such subjection being an essential part of their obedience "unto the Lord," who had appointed that it should be rendered, in all things lawful, for his own glory and the benefit of mankind. For the husband was constituted "the head of the wife," as her ruler and protector, both in Providence, and by the law of God: even as Christ was "the Head of the church," and the Saviour of this his mystical body. (Marg. Ref. m—q. Note, 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) The government of Christ, and the subjection of the church, are highly conducive to the benefit of the latter, as his authority is that of wisdom and love: and in general, it is beneficial to the women to "be subject to their own husbands," in the same manner that "the church is subject to Christ;" though the rule may admit of some exceptions. (Notes, Gen. 3:16. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) But to render submission more easy, beneficial, and comfortable, "husbands" also are commanded to "love their wives," with that tender, constant, faithful, and compassionate affection, which Christ showed to the church. (Marg. Ref. s.) He had even "given himself" to the death upon the cross, in order to save his people from their sins; that, having atoned for their guilt, he might also cleanse them from their pollution, by those influences of the Holy Spirit, of which the baptismal water was the external sign; and which were communicated through the word, as the means of their conversion and progressive sanctification. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Notes, John 3:4,5. 17:17—19. Tit. 3:4—7. Heb. 10:19—22. 1 Pet. 1:22—25. 3:21,22.) Thus, the heavenly Bridegroom prepares the whole multitude of his people, his one espoused bride, for the completion of the sacred union; that he may "present her to himself," as the object of his choice, the purchase of his blood, and the work of his grace, a glorious and glorified church, not having one remaining spot of sin, or wrinkle of imperfection, or any thing of the kind but made complete in holiness, without the least remaining 28 So ought men to love their wives, [d]as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himself.

29 For no man ever yet [e]hated his own flesh; but [f]nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church:

30 For we [g]are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

31 For [h]this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

32 This is [i]a great mystery: but [k]I speak concerning Christ and the church.

33 Nevertheless, [l]let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself: and the wife see that she [m]reverence her husband.

V. 28—31. The apostle, having described in the most affecting manner "the love of Christ to his church," and the subjection of the church to his authority, here shows, that men ought to love their wives with a wise, holy, constant, and tender affection, in conformity to that perfect pattern: in every thing seeking their comfort and advantage, sympathizing in their sorrows, bearing with their infirmities, and endeavouring to promote their salvation and sanctification. They ought indeed "to love them even as their own bodies:" for so intimate and indissoluble is this endeared relation, in its original intention, and when properly entered upon and attended to; that a man in "loving his wife" may be said "to love himself;" as her comfort and happiness are, and should be deemed, inseparable from his own. Now, no man in his senses, can "hate his own flesh," or take pleasure in wounding and paining it: but self-love teaches him "to nourish and cherish it," even as the Lord does his church, and every believer in it; each of whom he graciously considers as a member of his body, and, as it were, a part "of his flesh and of his bones." Thus "ought men to love their wives," be tender and kind to them, and provide for their comfort. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, Deut. 24:5. Prov. 5:15—19. Ec. 9:7—9.)—What an affecting view does this give of Christ's love to his people! "He loves, and nourishes, and cherishes them," as a man does his own body!—To instruct us in these duties, the Lord, by the original institution of marriage, commanded men to leave even their parents, in order to join interests and affections with their wives, as if they became indissolubly one body or one flesh with them. All contrary to this, and short of this, is the effect of sin, and ought to be peculiarly guarded against: that so, every man may consider the wife of his choice, or rather of God's choice for him, as a part of himself, whom he cannot injure without injuring himself, and who cannot be hurt without his sharing the harm; even as if any part of his own body had been wounded. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Gen. 2:21—24. Mal. 2:13—16. Matt. 19:3—6. Mark 10:2—12. 1 Cor. 6:12—17. 7:1—5.)

V. 32, 33. "This is" indeed, says the apostle, "a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the church." This was the "great mystery," of which marriage was a shadow, or emblem, especially in its primary institution. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) "Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular" thence learn, in what manner to "love his wife, even as himself," and be supplied with motives so to do; and every woman to respect and honour the person and authority of the husband, as constituted her head by the law and Providence of God. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) It is obvious, that there must, in all cases, be manifold defects and failures on both sides, in the present state of human nature; and often grievous offences may be committed: yet this does not materially alter the duty of the injured party, except in some cases elsewhere provided for. (Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. 19:7—9. 1 Cor. 7:6—16.) Indeed, a great part of the difficulty and duty consists in persevering good behaviour, notwithstanding unsuitable returns.—It is observable that the apostle says, "let every one love his wife," not wives; so that polygamy is not even supposed by the exhortation to exist among Christians.—Mystery. (32) The vulgate, or the old Latin version exclusively used by the church of Rome, renders this, sacrament; which is the only scriptural reason, or shadow of reason, for the absurdity of numbering marriage among the sacraments, even while that church considers the married state inconsistent with nigh attainments in holiness, forbids its priests to marry, and discourages marriage in various other ways!—Many have enlarged on this mystery, namely the appointment of marriage in the garden of Eden, as a type or emblem of Christ and his church; for so they understand it. The following quotation gives the substance of ancient and modern expositions of the passage, in this particular.—"Adam, in whom the whole human race began, was a natural image of Christ, in whom the human race was to be restored: and his deep sleep, the opening of his side, and the formation of Eve of a rib taken out of his side, were fit emblems of Christ's death, of the opening of his side on the cross, and of the regeneration of believers by his death. The love which Adam expressed towards Eve, and his union with her by marriage, were lively emblems of Christ's love to believers, and of his eternal union with them in one society after the resurrection. And Eve herself, who was formed of a rib taken from Adam's side, was a natural image of believers, who are regenerated, both in their body and mind, by the breaking of Christ's side on the cross. ... These circumstances ... we may suppose ... to prefigure that great event; and by prefiguring it, to show that it was decreed of God from the beginning.' Macknight.—The mystery in reality is, that he, "who is God over all, blessed for evermore," should, from most free love of Adam's fallen race, become Man, Emmanuel, and thus "purchase the church with his own blood;" and should love this church of redeemed sinners, with a love immensely exceeding that of the most endeared relations among men. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 13:10,11. John 15:12—16. Rom. 5:6—10. 1 John 3:1—3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Wicked men follow the example of "their father the devil," and may be known as his progeny. (Notes, John 8:41—47. 1 John 3:7—10.) Surely then, the "beloved children of God" should imitate his holiness, and ought especially to walk in love with their brethren and their neighbours, and even with their enemies, "as Christ hath loved them." The perfection and obligations of this example are infinite: so that there is no kind or degree of self-denying, liberal, laborious, patient, or forgiving love, to which it will not direct and animate the grateful believer.—We should always keep in mind our character as Christians, and inquire whether this or the other part of our conduct "becometh saints," the redeemed, sanctified, and devoted worshippers of God. This will teach us, not only that gross sensualities, and avarice, are utterly inconsistent with our relation to God; but that every inexpedient indulgence, and every degree of selfishness must be avoided. It is not enough to avoid all "filthiness and foolish talking:" even witty and ingenious repartees, which would ensure applause, must be repressed, with great self-denial, when they in the least infringe upon purity piety, or charity, and are unsuitable to the Christian character. Our social intercourse ought to be conducted entirely in another manner, in subserviency to mutual improvement, which will best be promoted by declaring the loving-kindness of the Lord, and celebrating his praises.—But the faithful instructer must not only specify what practices are wrong: in many things he must insist upon it, that they "who do them have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ;" and warn men not to be "deceived with vain words," and so emboldened to those crimes, for which "the wrath o God cometh on the children of disobedience;" that they may be put on their guard, and refuse to "be partakers with them." The darkness of paganism, and even that of many nominal Christians, may seem to accord with various evil practices; but those who profess the gospel should consider themselves as "light in the Lord:" and if they indeed are "the children of light," the Spirit of God will lead them far from all the scenes of sensual, riotous, and dissipated pleasure; and cause them to bring forth the fruit of "goodness, righteousness, and truth." (Notes, Rom. 8:1,2,12,13.) Yet, even they need exhortations "to walk in the light," and "to prove" more fully "what is acceptable to the Lord," to avoid all degrees of "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," and boldly to protest against them by word and deed; to let the light of their holy conversation so "shine before men," that sinners may be convicted in their own consciences, even in respect of those "secret" crimes, of which it is a shame to speak, write, or preach, in a particular manner. (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18.) For the holy converse and conduct of a consistent Christian is of the nature of light: it manifests that the contrary conduct of others is inexcusable; and his very silence is often most emphatically eloquent and convincing. After the example therefore of prophets and apostles, we should call on those who are "asleep and dead" in sin, to "awake and arise, that Christ may give them light:" and the Lord will employ such warnings and invitations to "quicken" with divine life some of many of the ignorant, the careless, the self-satisfied among our hearers, and so guide them into the ways of peace and

CHAPTER VI.

The apostle exhorts children and parents to their respective duties, 1—4; and also servants and masters, 5—9. He animates his brethren to resist their spiritual enemies, by putting on and using diligently "the whole armour of God," 10—17, and by persevering prayer; supplicating for all saints, and for him especially, that he might preach the gospel with all boldness, 18—20. He commends Tychicus to them, and concludes with affectionate salutations, 21—24.

salvation, even as he uses the further instructions of his ministers, to guide the converted in the paths of holy and joyful obedience. (Note, Is. 42:13—17.)

V. 15—20. By the light of divine truth we should walk with accuracy and "circumspection;" "redeeming our time" from sloth, needless sleep or recreation, and impertinent visits, for useful and important purposes; because life, health, liberty, and the use of our senses and understandings, are at all times uncertain. The world also is full of misery and iniquity; and there is "no work nor counsel . . . in the grave, whither we are going." Let us then acquaint ourselves with the will of our Lord, attend to his work, and wait for his coming. Thus we shall practically show our wisdom; while many prove their folly by speaking frequently and earnestly about religion, without knowing or doing the will of the Lord. (Note, Jam. 3:13—16.) When we are afflicted, or wearied, or depressed, let us not have recourse to a vain exhilaration, by any kind or degree of intemperance, which is hateful and pernicious, and ends in deeper dejection: but, by fervent prayer, let us seek to be "filled with the Spirit," and to be satisfied with his holy consolations; and let us avoid whatever may grieve our gracious Comforter. Thus we shall be animated to "speak to each other in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs;" instead of those vain songs, in praise of war, sensual love, hunting, drinking, and such like, which are in use among men called Christians, just as odes to Mars, Venus, Bacchus, or Diana, were among the Gentiles. Let us at least, with the melody of a grateful heart, "give thanks always, for all things to our God and Father, in the name of" his beloved Son: and thus we shall anticipate the joys of heaven, in the communion of the saints on earth.

V. 21—33. If we all were "subject one to another in the fear of God," and according to our several relations in life; society would appear like a well organized body, and every individual would share the advantages.—Every relative duty should be enforced by evangelical motives and examples.—The most entire submission of wives to their own husbands will be no infringement of their liberty, if performed "for the Lord's sake;" and after the example of the church's obedience to him: especially if "husbands also love their wives," after the pattern of Christ's love to his chosen people. He died for them, "that he might sanctify and cleanse them," to be to him for an honour and praise to all eternity, and that he might be glorious in making them happy. While we adore and rejoice in this condescending love, and press forward to that perfect holiness which is intended for us; and while we reverence both the mystery of this sacred union with the Lord, as "members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;" and his loving authority over us, who "nourisheth and cherisheth us, as a man doth his own flesh:" let husbands hence learn how to love their wives, and to show themselves justly entitled to superiority, by wisdom, joined with tender sympathy and patient care; and let wives hence learn to obey and "reverence their husbands." If the original appointment of marriage, and the subject before us, were duly attended to, all harshness, tyranny, and unfaithfulness, must be excluded: for "no man hateth his own flesh:" and on the other hand, all contests for superiority, and unreasonable attachment to humour and inclination, as interfering with cheerful obedience, would be prevented. In short, were Christianity general, and Christians more attentive to the precepts of their Lord; harmony and affectionate confidence would sweeten domestic life, without any material interruption or alloy. But as all are sinners, it behooves every individual to make many concessions and allowances, and to persevere in the duty of the relation, though attended with many a cross. Thus the worst evils will be prevented; and even an offending or unbelieving partner may be won upon: whereas, a retaliation of misconduct can only render disagreement perpetual, and resentment more deep and malignant, and so produce the most painful, disgraceful, and injurious consequences.

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. The apostle next exhorts believers, who had parents living, to be obedient to them, "in the Lord," for his sake, from gratitude to him, in obedience to his commands, and for the honour of his gospel. (Note, Col. 3:16,17, v. 16.) The Lord Jesus seems especially intended. This general exhortation must be limited, according to the ages and particular circumstances of children. Some, it is probable, had Gentile parents; and they ought not to obey them, when their commands contradicted those of Christ: yet, it would be peculiarly incumbent on them to give up their own will in all things lawful, for the credit of Christianity. The obedience of children to their parents, thus limited, is in itself "right," equitable, and reasonable, a debt due to the instruments of their existence, and the tender guardians of their infancy; and generally conducive to their good. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) Indeed, the sentiments of all nations coincide in this; and the law of God expressly commands children "to honour" the persons and authority of both father and mother, and to requite their kindness as they have opportunity and ability. This was placed in the decalogue, as "the first commandment" of the second table, being the first of the relative duties, and the source of all the others: and a promise of long life in the land of Canaan was annexed to it, as given to the Israelites, which might be generally applied to Christians, and encourage them to expect temporal comfort and length of days, as a gracious recompense for their obedience; unless the Lord should see good to reward it more liberally in another life. Indeed, it has been observed in every age, that those who have distinguished themselves by filial obedience were remarkably prospered. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Gen. 9:20—23. Ex. 20:12. Lev. 19:3. Prov. 1:8. Matt. 15:3—6.)—The apostle also exhorted parents (for though fathers only are mentioned, doubtless mothers also were intended) to use their authority without rigour; lest their children should be discouraged, prejudiced against Christianity, or provoked to obstinacy and disobedience; which would always prove painful to the parents, and often ruinous to the children. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Ex. 21:15—17. P. O. 12—36. Deut. 21:18—21. Prov. 29:17. 30:17.) The restraints, reproofs, and corrections of parents, ought therefore always to be used in a meek, affectionate, and forgiving disposition: while they diligently educate their children in such a manner, and with such instructions, as may best initiate them in the knowledge of Christ and true religion; and give them such friendly admonitions, as may guard them against the various snares of the world, and the temptations of Satan. (Marg. Ref. g Notes, Prov. 13:24. Col. 3:20,21.)—In these exhortations the inferior relation is constantly mentioned first; perhaps because the duty of it is most contrary to corrupt nature: yet it ought to be attended to, even when the superiors neglect theirs.—"Instruct them in the principles of piety towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus. . . . Make them to read the Scriptures, says Theophylact, which is the duty of all Christians: for is it not a shame to instruct them in heathen authors, whence they may learn bad things, and not to instruct them in the oracles of God?" Whitby. This is an important remark: but immensely more is required, in catechizing and otherwise instructing children, in reproof, mild correction, example, conversation, watchfulness against every thing in word or deed unbecoming in their presence, seizing every opportunity of drawing their attention to the great truths and duties of religion, and illustrating the effects of wickedness, the love of God and the state of the world. Indeed immensely more than can be even hinted at in a note, is implied in this brief exhortation.—Honour, &c. (2,3.) From the LXX, omitting the latter clause, "the good land which the Lord thy God giveth unto thee."—It accords with the Hebrew. (Ex. 20:12.)

V. 5—9. The apostle next exhorts servants, who had embraced Christianity, to be "obedient to their masters" "according to the flesh," that is, to whom they were subjected in temporal matters. In general, the servants at that time were slaves, the property of their masters; and were often treated with great severity, though seldom with that systematic cruelty which commonly attends slavery in these days. But the apostles were ministers of religion, not polias the servants of Christ, [o]doing the will of God [p]from the heart;

7 With [q]good-will doing service, [r]as to the Lord, and not to men:

8 Knowing that [s]whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, [t]whether he be bond or free.

ticians; they had not that influence among rulers and legislators, which would have been requisite for the abolition of slavery. Indeed in that state of society as to other things, this would not have been expedient: God did not please miraculously to interpose in the case; and they were not required to exasperate their persecutors, by expressly contending against the lawfulness of slavery. Yet, both "the law of love," and the gospel of grace, tend to its abolition as far as they are known and regarded; and the universal prevalence of Christianity must annihilate slavery, with many other evils, which in the present state of things cannot wholly be avoided. (Notes, Ex. 21:20. 1 Cor. 7:17—24.)—"In the wisdom of God," the apostles were left to take such matters as they found them, and to teach servants and masters their respective duties, in the performance of which the evil would be mitigated; till in due time it should be extirpated by Christian legislators.—Servants were therefore taught to "obey their masters," not only with a respectful attention to their persons and authority, and a fear of displeasing them; but with a jealous and trembling fear of offending and dishonouring God by an improper behaviour. This was to be done, with a single desire and aim to do the will of "Christ," their great and gracious Master, whom they obeyed, in conscientiously serving even an unreasonable and tyrannical earthly master. (Marg. Ref. h—m.) They were also to do their work, of whatever kind, "not as eyeservants," who are diligent in their master's presence, and slothful in his absence, being only desirous of "pleasing man;" but as "the servants of God," who heartily did his will, even in their secular employments. Then they would cheerfully and assiduously do service to their masters, as endeavouring "to please the Lord, and not men," in so doing; being assured, that whatever good action any man did, from Christian principles, it would be graciously recompensed by the Lord; and that a poor slave would be as much accepted, in performing the duty of his place, as any free man in his apparently more important services. (Marg. Ref. n—t. Notes, Col. 3:22—25. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. Tit. 2:9,10. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) On the other hand, believing masters ought to act from the same principles, and in the same conscientious manner toward their servants, whether these were "Christians" or not: exercising their authority with humanity and gentleness; not only without inflicting rigorous punishments, as it was common for masters to do; but also forbearing to menace and terrify their servants, or to express any haughty or excessive anger at them, even when most evidently faulty. For though the laws of man gave them great power in this respect; yet they must remember, that they were accountable to the great Lord and Master of all for their use of it; who would deal with men, according to their conduct toward their inferiors, and who expects his people to copy the example of his lenity and mercy. V. 10—13. The apostle here draws his practical instructions to a close, by a figurative exhortation, taken from military affairs. As the soldiers of Christ, the Ephesians were called to 'fight under his banner, against Satan, the world, and sin:' but they were too weak in themselves for this conflict; and must therefore "be strong in the Lord," by a continual reliance on his mighty power for protection, support, and assistance. (Marg. Ref. b. Note, 2 Tim. 2:1,2.) In the fulness of Christ, and in the promised influences and assistance of the Holy Spirit, a "panoply," or complete suit of armour, was provided for every believer: this the Lord held out, as it were, to the Christians at Ephesus, and all others, that, receiving it from him, by the prayers of faith, they might put it on daily, in a diligent and watchful use of the appointed means. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, Rom. 13:11—14.) Thus armed, they might be able "to stand against" the assaults of Satan, by whatever artful methods he or his instruments attempted to obstruct their progress. For they, and all Christians, were called to conflict and "wrestle," not only against their own in-dwelling corruptions, the opposition of persecutors, the enticements of wicked men, and the allurements of the world; but also against those invisible and formidable principalities and powers, who "ruled the darkness of this world;" even Satan and his angels, the great authors of man's ignorance, idolatry, delusion, impiety, and iniquity, all over the earth. These might be called "spiritual wickednesses in high places," not only as they held their empire in the air, according to the general opinion, (Note, 2:1,2.) and tempted men to wickedness, especially in their religion: but also as being the authors of all idolatry. Indeed they became proud rebels and apostates even "in heavenly places." Having been "spiritual wickednesses" in that holy world, they were cast out thence: and had from the beginning opposed man's entrance into heaven by every means which malice, sagacity, and subtlety could suggest. (Marg. Ref. c—k. Notes, 2 Pet. 2:4—9. Jude 5—8. Rev. 12:7—12.) It was therefore indispensably necessary for all, engaged in this warfare, to be completely armed for the conflict with such powerful and determined enemies; that they might "be able to stand in the evil day" of peculiar temptation or persecution, or at the approach of death. They must be prepared every day for the conflict, and would continually be called to resist their foes: but some days would peculiarly encourage or give advantage to Satan's assaults. They could not however know beforehand, when such occasions would be afforded him, and permission granted him: (Notes, Job 1:9—12. 2:6. Luke 22:31—34.) they must, as vigilant and valiant soldiers, be always ready; that thus "withstanding in the evil day," and having done all, they might stand victorious on the field of battle, and be approved by their great Commander; as David, having conquered for himself and Israel, stood before the king with the head of Goliath in his hand. (1 Sam. 17:57.)

belt, when they marched out to the battle. "Righteousness," or an habitual and conscientious obedience to the various commandments of God, should be the ir "breastplate," which would defend them from fatal wounds in the day of conflict; whereas conscious negligence and disobedience would render them afraid to face persecution or death, in the cause of Christ. (Marg. Ref. o, p.) To stand their ground in difficult or slippery situations, or to march forward in rugged paths, "their feet must be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;" that is, their motives and encouragements to obedience, amidst temptations and persecutions, must be derived from a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the gospel; through which God is revealed as "in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," and actually at peace with every believer, notwithstanding past transgressions, and present defects and infirmities. (Notes, Rom. 5:1,2. 8:1,2.) This assurance would make obedience delightful, though self-denying; and animate the established believer to resist temptation, to endure tribulation, and to march through difficulties and enemies, in the cause of Christ and in the way to heaven. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, Deut. 33:25. Luke 15:22—24, v. 22.) Over all their other armour, "faith" must be placed as a "shield:" by crediting the testimony of God, realizing unseen objects, resting the soul on the promises, and relying on the power, truth, mercy, wisdom, grace, and providence of God, according to his word; they would be able to ward off the temptations of Satan; as soldiers received the spears or javelins of the enemy on their shields. (Notes, Heb. 11:1,2. 1 Pet. 5:8,9.) The suggestions of the tempter would indeed often resemble "darts," by the suddenness and violence with which they were injected, and "fiery darts," by the fatal effects produced by them. For, as poisoned darts would fatally inflame the blood of those wounded by them; and as firebrands thrown into a besieged city would at length effect a destructive conflagration, unless immediately extinguished; so the suggestions of Satan would inflame the anger, pride, sensual passions, avarice, or other corrupt propensities of the heart, unless immediately intercepted and quenched by "the shield of faith," resting on the promises, and the truth, power, and mercy of God, to perform them. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Note, Gen. 39:8—10.)—This clause is often interpreted exclusively of those harassing temptations, by which hard thoughts of God, and horrid or despondding conclusions concerning themselves, are excited in men's minds. These lead to immense distress, and eventually to guilt; and faith in the promises of God must extinguish them: yet the apostle evidently meant the words in a more comprehensive sense.—To all this, "Hope," or a scriptural and prevailing and animating expectation of victory and eternal glory, must supply the place of "a helmet" to cover the head in the day of battle; by counteracting that discouragement, which doubtfulness of the event would induce, in times of sharp temptation: so that it might be called "the helmet of salvation," as nothing could be courageously done without it. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 1 Thes. 5:4—11. Heb. 6:16—20. 1 Pet. 1:13—16.) To complete the whole, the word of God must serve the Christian soldier for "a sword:" an exact and comprehensive acquaintance with its various doctrines, promises, precepts, warnings, and a readiness at recollecting and adducing pertinent texts, upon every emergency, would drive the tempter to a distance, and procure a final victory over him. (Notes, Is. 59:16—19. Matt. 4:1—11.) Thus the whole suit of armour would be complete: for no covering was provided for the back; as victory must be sought by valour, not by cowardice.

V. 18—20. To give all the rest their full efficacy; to procure, put on, and keep bright, this "whole armour of God;" the soldiers of Christ must "pray always:" constantly, frequently, at stated times, in occasional ejaculations, and more abundantly in the prospect or in the hour of temptation; using all kinds "of prayer and supplication," in dependence on the Holy Spirit, and according to his teaching and influences; and "watching unto this very thing," guarding against all remissness, discouragement, weariness, interruptions, and unseasonable engagements; "with all perseverance:" (Notes, Matt. 26:40,41. 1 Pet. 4:7.) seeing Satan would peculiarly tempt them to negligence on this important concern, that he might obtain further advantages against them. (Marg. Ref. z—d.)—They must also remember to help one another, and "all the saints," by their prayers for them. Especially, the apostle entreated their prayers for him, that he might have opportunity, and liberty of spirit, boldly to declare his important message, in the face of danger and death: for, though he was Christ's ambassador of peace to the Gentiles, he was at that time executing his commission in confinement and in fetters; so greatly was his glorious Lord despised among men! (Notes, 3:1—7, v. 1. Acts 4:29—31. Phil. 1:12—14.) He, however, did not regard this degradation, or express any anxiety about his own liberty; provided he were enabled to speak with becoming boldness, firmness, and impartiality, when called to bear testimony to the truth. (Marg. Ref. e—m. Note, Acts 4:29—31.)—Praying always, &c. (18) Notes, Luke 18:1—8. Phil. 4:5—7. 1 Thes. 5:16—22. 2 Tim. 1:3—5.—The reader, who is acquainted with what has been copiously written on this subject, will perceive, that, in a few particulars, the exposition here given of the Christian panoply rather varies from that of some approved writers. Zeal for particular doctrines often renders pious men too apt to explain every expression in support of them: though it weakens the general proof of them, makes one part of the Scriptures concide with the other by a needless repetition, and leaves out other matters equally important. Indeed, it may be apprehended, that by adducing every thing which can be thought of, in explaining metaphors, many things are supposed to be contained in them, which were entirely out of the writer's mind when he wrote them.—Bonds. (20) Or, "in a chain."—'The apostle was allowed to live at Rome, with a soldier that kept him.—To this soldier he was tied with a chain, fixed on his right wrist, and fastened to the soldier's left arm; and the chain being of a convenient length, the two could walk together with ease. ... The soldiers, who were thus employed, no doubt reaped great benefit from the apostle's conversation and preaching.' Macknight. This is probable, and the thought is worthy of attention; but the words, 'no doubt,' imply more than we know on the subject.

V. 21—24. The apostle knew, that the Ephesians would be anxious to be informed of many things concerning him, but it was not requisite for him to write on that subject, as he had sent with this epistle a brother and minister, competent to inform them, both how he did, and how he was employed, and to encourage and edify them by his converse and preach-

At the same time, he give them his apostolical blessing, in such language, as showed that the grace or special favour and mercy of God, would be on all them, and on them only, who "loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," and in an uncorrupt and holy manner. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The gospel furnishes believers with most efficacious motives to the cheerful performance of all relative duties: and the law directs those whom "Christ hath redeemed from its curse," in what manner they may "adorn his doctrine" and "show forth his praise:" for all its commandments are right and beneficial. (Notes, Rom. 7:9—12. Tit. 2:9,10.)—When children "honour and obey their parents," they take a proper method to obtain temporal comfort and prosperity: and when they do it "in the Lord," from faith and love, it forms an evidence of their interest in his promises, which will be fulfilled in their everlasting felicity. Similar motives should induce parents, to attend diligently to the education of their children, with meekness, firmness, prudence, and affection; that they may "not provoke them to wrath" or tempt them to sin, but "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." But alas! how grievously is this duty neglected, even among those who are zealous for the great doctrines of the gospel! How many parents "seem to be religious," and are strict in some things; yet by their imprudence, violent passions, harshness, or unforgiving temper and conduct, disgust their children, prejudice them against religion, render them uncomfortable in their presence, and consequently induce them to prefer almost any other company! This does not indeed excuse the children's disobedience; but it awfully occasions it. On the other hand, how commonly do we see more regard paid to every kind of instruction, or trifling embellishment, than to the religious principles and conduct of young persons! So that too often the education given to children leads them to those habits, notions, or connexions, which make way for their subsequent ungodliness, infidelity, dissipation, licentiousness, or avarice; by which they ruin themselves, and propagate impiety, vice, and misery, in an accumulating progression. Those who fear God and love their children, should watch and pray, even with trembling, that they may not thus prove the occasion of condemnation to their own offspring; for, though God alone can change the heart, yet he commonly does it, by the good instructions and example of parents, the means which they use for their children's spiritual good, and in answer to their fervent prayers. (Note, Gen. 18:18,19.)—The grand maxim to be laid down, as most of all giving a scriptural ground to expect the blessing, is this: 'Decidedly "seek," for your children as well as yourselves, "first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness;" and steadily subordinate all regard to temporal advantage, and external accomplishment, and even proficiency in learning, to this great concern. Desire and aim "first of all," that your children may be true Christians; and form all your plans in entire subserviency to this main object.' Whereas they, whose chief anxiety seems to be, that their children may be wealthy, polite, learned, or accomplished, whatever be the event to their souls; or who suffer these things materially to influence their plan of education, and to interfere with their children being "brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," can have no scriptural ground to expect his blessing upon them.—Again, it is probable that but few masters will refuse their approbation to the injunctions here laid on their servants, or servants their approbation to the exhortations given to their masters; but alas! those who ought to obey the precept, are exceedingly prone to object to it, or to explain it slightly. The greater advantages, however, servants now enjoy to what slaves of old did, or slaves in many countries now do, the more cheerfully should they yield obedience and perform service "to their own masters;" and the greater caution should they use not to dishonour the gospel by a negligent refractory, contentious, or unfaithful behaviour. They ought especially to avoid whatever may give plausibility to the imputation of their being "eyeservants, and menpleasers:" but they should always act as in the fear of God, and with good-will do service to their masters, as unto the "Lord, and not unto men." This will engage the servants of Christ to diligence in their work, even if their earthly masters behave harshly and injuriously to them; and it will sanctify all their employments, and secure them a gracious recompense from the Lord himself. The same principles will render "masters" considerate kind, gentle, and conscientious, in their whole deportment: "remembering that they also have a Master in Heaven," who "is no Respecter of persons." And what orderly and happy families will those be, where relative duties are thus on all sides constantly and circumspectly attended to!

V. 10—17. If we would serve the Lord in this evil world, we must depend on him for "strength," as well as for instruction, and a merciful acceptance. Our enemies indeed are mighty, and "we are without strength;" but our Redeemer is "almighty," and "in the power of his might" we may overcome all who oppose our course. Let us then daily "put on the armour," which "the Captain of our salvation" has prepared for us; that, being sober and vigilant, and always ready for the battle, we may be "able to stand against all the wiles of the devil." The potent rulers of the darkness of this world, who wrought "spiritual wickedness" in heaven, will oppose our march to that inheritance which they have lost, and endeavour if possible to bring us to that hell to which they are condemned. They often have powerful allies in the principalities of the earth, and wicked men always fight under their banner: but our "flesh," the corrupt nature, the traitor in the camp, is our most dangerous foe; while fear of present suffering, and desire of present gratification, gain, honour, or distinction, continually war against our souls. We must therefore engage in this warfare as men in earnest, habitually expecting the onset of our foes, either by open violence, or deeply laid stratagems. Some "fiery darts" will every day be thrown at us, to inflame our passions or distress our hearts: but "evil days" of peculiar danger and difficulty must be expected; and we shall not be able to withstand in them, and, "having done all, to stand" as conquerors before our Captain, unless we be constantly armed for the fight. (Note, Luke 21:34—36. P. O. 20—38.) The soldier who is secure in the enemy's country, will probably be assaulted and shamefully worsted when he least expects it. (Notes, 2 Sam. 11: Matt. 26:40—46,69—75.) Habitual sincerity in professing and obeying the truth, and uprightness towards God and man, must be "the girdle of our loins," and the breastplate in this important warfare; but then "our feet must also be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace." In the constant exercise of vigorous faith and lively hope, we shall possess our impenetrable "shield," and our "helmet of salvation:" while with "the sword of the Spirit," even "the word of truth," we may drive our enemies before us, and seek the victory for ourselves and our fellow-combatants. (Notes, and P. O. Matt. 4:1—11.)

V. 18—24. If we would indeed "put on," and successfully use, "the whole armour of God;" we must likewise "pray always by the Spirit," with great earnestness and importunity, and "watch thereunto with all perseverance:" thus we shall be made "more than conquerors through him that loved us;" but in no other way.—We should also consider all the saints, wherever they live, as fellow-soldiers in our spiritual warfare, though divided into different battalions, distinguishable by a few unimportant externals; and we must help them all with our supplications: for general success against the powers of darkness, the kingdom of Satan, as well as personal victory, should be our noble ambition. But, all Christians are bound in a peculiar manner to pray for the ministers of the gospel, as they are exposed to the special rage of the enemy: when they fall, it is "as when a standardbearer fainteth," and their honourable conduct is of the greatest importance to the triumph of the gospel. Those ministers especially, who are exposed to great hardships and perils in their work, have particularly a claim to the prayers of their brethren. For "the ambassadors of peace," from the Lord to his rebellious creatures, have often been cast into prison and put to death as criminals.—It is peculiarly desirable, that "utterance should be given them" in perilous situations, that they may "boldly declare the mystery of the gospel:" for the more boldly they speak, in consistency with "the meekness of wisdom" and love, the better do they perform their work. Men of this stamp rather desire to "make full proof of their ministry," than to enjoy personal ease or liberty: their own affairs are inconsiderable in their judgment, compared with the success of the gospel. They, however, greatly rejoice to have beloved brethren and faithful ministers, who are able to comfort and establish the people in their absence: and, while they pray for peace, with faith and love, in behalf of all who profess the gospel, they must also remind them, that "grace will be with all them," and them only, "who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

THE manner, in which the apostle and his associates were led to pass over from Asia into Europe, and to begin their labours at Philippi in Macedonia: as well as their success, and the persecution by which Paul and Silas were driven thence, have been already considered. (Notes, Acts 16:) The apostle had once afterwards visited Philippi, though few particulars are recorded. (Note, Acts 20:1—6.) As this epistle was manifestly written from Rome, and during the latter part of the apostle's first imprisonment in that city; nearly twelve years had passed since he first preached at Philippi: but the conduct of the Christians there had uniformly been so exemplary, and their grateful affection to him so fully evinced, that he had only to rejoice over them with heartfelt gratitude, while he poured out his prayers for them, and affectionately animated them to persevere and press forward in their heavenly course. Some cautions indeed, against deceivers of different descriptions, (Note, 3:17—19.) whose base conduct and awful doom he declares in most expressive terms, are joined with his exhortations. Not one censure, however, is passed or implied on any of the Philippians; but unqualified commendation and confidence. (Notes, Rev. 2:8—11.) It is evident, that Epaphroditus, who had been sent with a supply of money to the apostle at Rome; and who seems to have been a pastor, and perhaps the principal pastor of the church, conveyed the epistle to Philippi. He had, either by his journey to Rome, or by his zealous labours in assisting the apostle when in that city, brought a dangerous sickness upon himself; the tidings of which so afflicted the Philippians, and their sorrow, when made known to Epaphroditus, so distressed him, that the apostle was induced to send him back sooner than he had intended, though to his own inconvenience. (Notes, 2:24—30.)—The subjects treated on, and the instructions to be deduced from them, need not be anticipated. 'The apostle's design in this epistle, (which is quite of the practical kind,) seems to be to comfort the Philippians under the concern they had expressed at the news of his imprisonment, to check a party spirit, that appears to have broke out among them, and to promote on the contrary an entire union and harmony of affection; to guard them against being seduced from the purity of the Christian faith, by Judaizing teachers; to support them under the trials with which they struggled; and above all, to inspire them with a concern to adorn their profession, by the most eminent attainments in the divine life.' Doddridge. It is undeniable, that the epistle was sent not long before the two years of the apostle's imprisonment at Rome were ended; which the Oxford Bible supposes to have taken place about the close of A. D. 65.—According to this I have dated the epistle, (though many fix an earlier date for it,) on a full conviction, that more years were spent in the various labours of this great apostle, than are generally supposed; yet, at the same time, not considering the subject as of great importance.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle addresses the saints at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons, 1, 2: shewing his thankfulness to God for their "fellowship in the gospel," to that time; his love to them; and his confidence in them as to the future, 3—8; and giving a summary of the blessings for which he prayed in their behalf. 9—11. He informs them that his imprisonment at Rome had conduced "to the furtherance of the gospel," 12, 13: so that many had been rendered more bold in preaching it; in which he greatly rejoices, though some did it from corrupt motives, 14—18; knowing that this "will turn to his salvation, through their prayers, and by the Spirit," and trusting that "Christ will be magnified in his body, whether by life or death," 19, 20. He declares that he is prepared for either event; that "to depart, and be with Christ, would be far better," for him; but that, as his life would be useful to them, he doubts in his choice, and supposes that he shall live, and be set at liberty, that he may further their joy of faith, by coming to them, 21—26. He exhorts them to walk worthy of their profession; to be of one mind "in striving for the gospel;" and to suffer cheerfully for Christ, as they had already been called to do, 27—30.

NOTES.—CHAP I. V. 1. As Paul's apostleship had never been called in question at Philippi; and as he wrote this epistle, not only in his own name, but in that of Timothy, who was then at Rome with him; he styles himself and Timothy "the servants of Jesus Christ." (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, John 12:23—26. 13:12—17. Col. 3:22—25. Jam. 1:1. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.) He addressed himself to "the saints at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons;" hence we learn that the distinction between bishops and presbyters was not then generally established: but that the pastors of the church were distinguished from the deacons, who managed the secular matters and the charities of the church. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, Acts 6:1—6. 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1—7.)—Much labour and learning have indeed been employed, to set aside this conclusion; but with little success, even by the allowance of decided Episcopalians.—'Though it be generally resolved, that the word "bishop," and "elder" are equivalent in Scripture: yet this is not to be understood so, that either, or both of them, signifies indifferently those whom we now call presbyters; but that they both signify bishops, one settled in each church by the apostles; there being no use of the second order in the church, till the numbers of believers increased.' Hammond. Beyond doubt, the apostle ordained more than one, either bishops or presbyters, in some of the churches. (Acts 14:23. 20:17.) Indeed the address fully proves it as to "the bishops." But this learned expositor did not perceive that one bishop, without any presbyters under him, comes to precisely the same thing, as one presbyter, without any bishop over him. Till the churches were multiplied, the bishops and presbyters were the same: but afterwards, probably in the times of the apostles, the senior o more eminent presbyter, was called episcopus, or overseer, not of the church only, but also of its pastors.

V. 2. Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:3.

V. 3—6. The conversion and subsequent good conduct of the Philippians never occurred to the apostle's mind, (and they would occur very frequently,) or were never mentioned to him, without animating him to thank God in their behalf; so that "always, in every prayer of his," secret or social, he made requests for them with lively emotions of joy, which would greatly help to solace him in his confinement. He thanked "God for their fellowship in the gospel," and its blessings, from the first day of their conversion to that present time, (which was about twelve years,) without having turned aside, or grown remiss in their profession. (Marg. Ref. i—n. Note, 1 Cor. 1:4—9.) He was therefore "confident, that he," even God the Spirit, who "had begun the good work" of sanctification in their souls, would carry it on, and perform it, till the perfection of their redemption, in body and soul, at the day of Christ. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 9—11. Rom. 8:18—23. Eph. 1:13,14. 1 Thes. 5:23—28.)—Some learned men render the words, here translated "fellowship in the gospel," 'communication toward the gospel;' and understand them of the liberality which the Philippians had shown towards the apostle. (Notes, 4:10—20.) But this, in itself, was a far inferior cause of gratitude to God, than the conversion of very many souls, to partake of all the blessings and salvation of Christ: the sentiment is not at al in the apostle's manner in other epistles: or even in the other parts of the epistle, where he mentions that subject openly all, [t]because [u]I have you in my heart; inasmuch [v]as both in my bonds, [w]and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are [x]partakers of my grace.

8 For [y]God is my record, [z]how greatly I long after you all [a]in the bowels of Jesus Christ.

9 And [b]this I pray, that [c]your love may abound yet more and more [d]in knowledge and in all [e]judgment;

10 That [e]ye may [§]approve things that are excellent; [f]that ye may be sincere [g]and without offence [h]till the day of Christ;

11 Being [i]filled with the fruits of righteousness, which [k]are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God. [Practical Observations.]

12 But I would ye should understand, brethren, [l]that the things which happened unto me have fallen out [m]rather unto the furtherance of the gospel;

13 So that [n]my bonds [o]in Christ are manifest in all [¶]the palace, and [r]in all other places;

14 And many of the [s]brethren in the Lord, [t]waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word [u]without fear.

15 Some indeed [v]preach Christ [w]even of envy and strife; [t]and some also of good will:

and perspicuously: the word here used more frequently means participation, than communication; and even when it has the latter meaning, it implies that the giver made the receiver his partner, or a sharer with him in his abundance.

V. 7, 8. Many, who had made a credible profession of Christianity, afterwards became apostates, having "no root in themselves." (Notes, Matt. 13:20,21. 1 Tim. 1:18—20. 2 Tim. 1:15. 2:14—18. 1 John 2:18,19.) Yet it was "meet" for the apostle to hope better things of the Philippians, and to be satisfied that a "good work" of new creation had indeed been wrought upon them. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) For their long-continued consistency of conduct had given them a peculiar place in his heart; or, (as it may be rendered more obviously, and in equal consistency with the idiom of the language,) they had shown, that "they had him in their hearts," and had abundantly evinced their love to Christ, by their kindness to his afflicted servant. (Marg. and Ref.) During his imprisonment, they had cordially sympathized with him, and endeavoured to alleviate his sufferings; and in all that he undertook for the defence and confirmation of the gospel, they had concurred with him, and shown themselves "partakers of the same grace," which had been bestowed upon him; acting from the same holy principles, and returning his love with reciprocal affection. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 4:10—20.) Indeed, "God was his witness," how greatly he longed after them, with a holy, tender, and compassionate affection, like that of Christ to his people: how he longed to see them, and how gladly he would exert himself in any self-denying services, by which he might be further useful to them, especially in their spiritual concerns.

V. 9—11. The apostle next gave the Philippians a compendious account of his constant prayers for them. He was confident that they were true believers, and "loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity:" (Note, Eph. 6:21—24, v. 22.) and he therefore prayed, "that their love" of him, his cause, people, truths, and ordinances; of the holy character, law, and government of God; and of all men for his sake, might "abound more and more" in all its varied exercises and happy effects: (Notes, 1 Thes. 4:1—5,9—12. 1 Pet. 1:22.) and that it might be regulated by an enlarged and exact "knowledge" of divine things; and by that sound judgment, which was the result of a holy relish for spiritual excellency, a matured discernment in the various parts of religion, and deep experience of its power in their hearts. For when these concurred, they enabled the Christian to judge, at once, in a variety of cases: even as the healthy eye distinguishes objects, the ear sounds, and the palate meats. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) Thus, false affections, unjustifiable measures, and enthusiasm, would be excluded; and all those evils prevented, into which vehement zeal, without proportionable "knowledge and judgment," betrayed men, to the scandal of the gospel, and the division of the church: and their abundant love would be directed in forming and executing designs of extensive usefulness. (Notes, Eph. 5:15—20. Col. 1:9—14, vv. 9,10. 3:16,17.) He further prayed, that they might be enabled to "distinguish things that differed," and to guard against counterfeit revelations, false affections, and all those specious errors and evils, by which Satan and his ministers imposed upon the unwary: thus they would choose and "approve things that were excellent," and reject others, however plausibly stated.—The marginal reading, "Try," or prove, "things which differ," is more exact than that inserted in the text: but it is evident, that "to distinguish things which differ," was especially intended. (Marg. and Ref.—Marg. Ref. e.) He also prayed, that they might be "sincere," not only as true believers, but as uncorrupted with base alloy, whether of false doctrine, superstition, or a worldly spirit and conduct. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) If the Philippians were thus "sincere," the apostle trusted that, according to his prayers for them, they would be "without offence;" neither stumbling at the scandals laid in their way by others, nor misleading or grieving their brethren, or causing their neighbours to stumble at the word, by their misconduct; for both the active and passive sense may be implied. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—Accordingly, he further prayed that each of them might be thus upheld, till he should honourably finish his course; and even that the church of Philippi might be thus preserved, through successive generations, "until the day of Christ:" and that the "trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD," might not only be in some measure fruitful; but that they might resemble those trees which are laden with fruit on every bough, being "filled with all the fruits of righteousness," even holy tempers, all kinds of good works, "all the fruits of the Spirit," through every day of their future lives, in the full improvement of their talents, and according to the duties of their several relations. For these good fruits would not only be beneficial to men, and eventually advantageous to themselves; but, through Christ, as the effects of his grace, and accepted through his mediation, they would redound to the praise and honour of God; adorning and recommending the gospel, silencing gainsayers, and bringing sinners to glorify God, by the obedience and worship of faith. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Ps. 92:13—15 Is. 61:1—3. John 15:6—8,12—16. Gal. 5:22—26.)

V. 12—14. It is probable, the apostle had been informed, that the Philippians feared lest his imprisonment should check the progress of the gospel, and intimidate others from preaching or embracing it: and no doubt Satan and his servants desired and expected this effect from it. He, however, would have his friends to know, that his sufferings had rather conduced to promote the cause of "Christianity," through the interposition of God; and that the restraint put upon his personal ministry had been more than counterbalanced by other circumstances. So that "his bonds for Christ's sake," and his constancy in them, the doctrine for which he was imprisoned, and which he preached when a prisoner, had become openly known, even in Nero's palace among his courtiers, and in all other parts of Rome; which had excited a general attention to the gospel, through that immense city, whence the report would circulate almost throughout the earth. Moreover, many Christians, appointed to the ministry, and qualified for it, who had before been timorous, perceiving how the apostle was protected, (comforted,) and

V. 15—18. While some, indeed, preached Christ out of "good-will to men," and zeal for the cause of true religion; there were others, who were actuated by envy of the apostle's reputation, success, or measure of liberty; and who aimed to cause divisions, even by preaching the gospel of peace! Probably these were Judaizers, who concealed part of their sentiments, and preached the substance of the gospel, in order to form a party under their influence, and in opposition to the apostle and his friends; that so they might gradually impose the Mosaic law on the Gentile converts. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) The designing, ambitious, and selfish conduct of these men, proved that they were insincere in what they preached, and that they only wanted to excite contentions; which would not only add affliction to the apostle's mind, during his imprisonment, but, as they supposed, would also increase the virulence of his persecutors.—Others, however, acted from love to him, for the sake of Christ: knowing that he was appointed, as the apostle of the Gentiles, to defend, as a bulwark, the pure gospel, against all who opposed or perverted it: and that he was now lodged in prison in the metropolis; not only as a witness for the truth, concerning justification and Christian liberty, against Judaizers, but also to bear testimony before senators, pretors, and courtiers, nay, perhaps before the emperor himself, concerning the holy doctrine of salvation through Christ Jesus. But, though some aimed to oppose, grieve, or injure him, even by preaching the gospel; yet, as Christ was preached by that means, either in a professed or a sincere zeal for his honour, among great numbers who had hitherto been strangers to the gospel, and who might in due time be more fully instructed in the faith; the apostle rejoiced, and he determined to do so, whatever consequences might ensue to himself. (Marg. Ref. u—c.) 'Not indeed with a pure mind, though otherwise their doctrine was pure.' Beza. It is not certain who these preachers were; or whether they meant to excite divisions between the Jewish and Gentile converts, or to stir up the persecuting rage of idolaters against the apostle, for boldly propagating a doctrine subversive of idolatry; or that of the emperor and statesmen against him, for "preaching another King, one Jesus." But the whole tenor of his writings and conduct shows, that if the doctrine which they taught had been materially erroneous, he would have opposed them, instead of rejoicing in the success of the preachers. (Notes, Gal. 1:6—10. 2:1—5.)

V. 19, 20. The apostle knew that these afflictive dispensations, however aggravated, would help forward his final salvation, through the prayers of his brethren, and the communication of "the Spirit of Christ" to his soul, to promote his humility, spirituality, and meetness for heaven. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 1:8—11. 4:13—18.) This satisfied him, as to his personal concern; for he was willing to endure any abasement or suffering, which might conduce to the honour of Christ. And indeed he earnestly expected a happy event of his trials; as one who, with outstretched neck, eagerly looks for the coming of some beloved friend: and he confidently hoped, that he should not be made ashamed in any thing, by the disappointment of his expectations or endeavours: but that as, in all former instances, he had boldly and successfully stood his ground; in this present case also, he should be strengthened, and inspired with courage, that Christ might be magnified in and by his frail body; whether his life were spared that he might again labour in spreading the gospel, or whether he should be called to shed his blood in confirmation of his testimony. (Marg. Ref. f—l. Notes, Rom. 6:12—19. 8:28—31.)—Salvation. (19) The connexion between "salvation" and "the supply of the Spirit of Christ," fully proves, that eternal salvation, and not temporal deliverance was meant. (Note, Rom. 3:11—14.)

The supply. (19) Επιχορηγιας. See on Eph. 4:16.—My earnest expectation. (20) Την αποκαραδοκιαν ... μου. See on Rom. 8:19.

V. 21—26. With peculiar animation, the apostle here declared the happy frame of his mind, in his perilous situation. As Christ was the Author and Support of his spiritual life, so was he the End and Object of his life on earth. (Notes, John 14:4—6. Gal. 2:17—21. Col. 3:1—4.) He had no other business, interest, honour, or pleasure, for which "to live," but Christ, and his glory, service, and favour: and therefore he knew that "to die" would be his greatest gain. For he should then be enabled more perfectly to know, love, serve, and enjoy the favour of his gracious Lord; and have done with sin, temptation, and suffering for ever. Yet if he continued "to live in the flesh," and to endure hardship a little longer, this would be "the fruit of his labour," and "worth his while:" as his labour would be fruitful of good to himself, as well as to others. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) So that he knew not which he should choose, if it were left to him; being "in a strait between two," and drawn both ways, by the reasons which he had to desire life on the one hand, and death on the other. Indeed, he had a strong desire "to depart" from this world of sin and sorrow, that he might immediately go and be with Christ; exchanging the life of faith, hope, and feeble love, for that of sight, fruition, and perfect holiness: as this was incomparably better, as to himself personally, than any thing which could be possessed or enjoyed on earth. Nevertheless, his continuance here was the more needful, for the benefit of his beloved people; and he was willing to postpone the completion of his own happiness for their comfort and advantage. (Marg. Ref. o—x.) Indeed, having this confidence respecting his own concerns, he was also assured by intimations from the Lord, that he should abide some time longer, to promote their growth and establishment in the faith, and the joy or glorying in God connected with it; and that, being permitted to come and renew his labours among them, he should be an instrument of increasing their abundant rejoicing in Christ. (Marg. Ref. y—b. Note, 2 Cor. 1:23,24.)—"Christ is gain to me, living and dying." (21) Thus Beza, and many others, translate and understand the words: but the antithesis between the two parts of the verse is thus destroyed: the meaning is comparatively cold, nay selfish; and though I would speak diffidently, after such eminently learned critics, the original seems incapable of this construction.—'The original is the highest superlative which it is possible to form in any language.' Macknight. 'Better beyond all comparison and expression.' Doddridge. 'Could St. Paul think a state of insensibility much better than a life tending so much, as his did, to the glory of God, to the propagation of the gospel, and to the furtherance of the joy of Christians?' Whitby.—The doctrine of the soul's immediate happiness, with Christ in glory, is here declared, beyond almost the possibility of doubt, except as men disbelieve the apostle's testimony. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8.)

V. 27—30. None of the events before referred to, nor any other, could harm the Christians at Philippi; if they "only" took heed to have "their conversation becoming the gospel," which they had embraced. (Note, Eph. 4:1—6.) The original word, rendered "conversation," denotes the conduct of citizens, when it accords to their privileges, and tends to the credit, safety, peace, and prosperity of the city. Thus having been most graciously made citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, they ought to act suitably to that high character, and to seek the honour of the gospel, and the welfare of the church, in all their actions. Then it would be well with them, and gladden the apostle's heart, "whether he came to see them," or only "heard of their affairs;" that they stood firm in the profession of the faith, and in obedience to Christ, amidst surrounding temptations, and bad examples; avoiding all dissensions; continuing as one body actuated by one spirit; being of one heart and mind, in the great concerns of religion; not striving one against another, either about their temporal interests or reputation, or about any things of subordinate importance in religion, in which they did not exactly agree; but, as one compact phalanx, striving with united force against the common enemy, to exclude false teachers, to prevent evils and errors, to bear up under persecution, and by every means to promote the grand cause of Christianity. (Marg. Ref. c—i.) In attending to these things, they ought in no wise to be intimidated by the number, power, menaces, or cruelties of their adversaries; whose malignant rage against such excellent persons, proved them enemies to God and holiness, who were in the way of perdition: while the meek and patient conduct of those who suffered for Christ's sake, united to the holiness of their characters, was an additional evidence that they were the friends of God, and "partakers of salvation," "even that of God," which he had planned, effected, revealed, and conferred; nay, wrought in the hearts of his people. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) For indeed they were called to an additional honour and privilege; in that "it was given to them not only to believe" in Christ for salvation, but to be distinguished among his disciples by a nearer conformity to him in suffering, for which their reward would be great in heaven. (Note, Matt. 5:10—12.) For they were then enduring the same honourable conflict which they had seen the apostle engaged in, when scourged and imprisoned at Philippi; and which they heard that he was at that time sustaining, by his imprisonment at Rome. (Marg. Ref. o—s. Notes, Acts 16:19—24. 21:27—40. 25:1—12. 28:16—31.)—Many expositors are very exact in this and other passages, in distinguishing between the persecutions which the apostle and the churches were exposed to from the Jews, and those which they endured from the Gentiles. But this rather embarrasses than clears the interpretation; and the practical instruction, if not thus lost sight of, is the same in either case. No doubt, the Jews excited most of the persecutions to which the apostle was exposed; and his zeal for the admission of the Gentiles into the church, without circumcision, or regard to the ritual law, rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to them. But it is also evident, that zeal for idolatry and for local customs, and fear of innovations and insurrections, joined with enmity against God and holiness, disposed the Gentiles generally to concur, and often to take the lead in persecution. (Notes, Acts 19:23—41.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Those servants of Christ, who most resemble their Lord, will cordially "thank God, on every remembrance" of the congregations among whom they have laboured; when they know that ministers and people, in their proper places, attend to their several duties, in such a manner as evinces them to have "fellowship with Christ," and to share the blessings of his gospel. (Note, 1 John 1:3,4.) But alas! how often are faithful pastors constrained to make request "with tears," instead of "with joy," for those in whom they once were confident, but for whom they now tremble! We may, however, be always confident, that God "will perform his good work" in every soul, in which he has really begun it by regeneration: though we should warn men not to trust in superficial appearances, sudden emotions, external reformation, change of sect or sentiment, or in any thing short of "a new creation" unto holiness. But, it is "meet for us to hope" the best of those who profess the truth, and do not disgrace it; and greatly to desire the spiritual welfare of those, who have showed us kindness for the Lord's sake, sympathized in our sorrows, and helped us in our "labours for the defence and confirmation of the gospel;" as we may well conclude, that they are really partakers of divine grace. We should "long after them in the bowels of Jesus Christ;" and pour out our prayers for them, especially when incapable of doing them other service.—We cannot in general pray for ourselves, and in behalf of those who possess that "faith which worketh by love," in a better manner, than by copying the example before us; and requesting that "our love may abound yet more and more," and be exercised "in knowledge and in all judgment;" that we and they may "discern between things that differ," and know how to choose the good and refuse the evil; that we may be sincere and diligent disciples; preserved from all scandals and offences, and "filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Christ, to the praise and glory of God." For those things which most honour God, will eventually most benefit us: we should not therefore leave it dubious, whether any good fruit be found on us, or not; a small measure of love, knowledge, judgment, spirituality, and fruitfulness, should not satisfy us: but we ought to long, and pray without ceasing, and use every appointed means with diligence and earnestness, that we may be "filled with all the fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God;" as aiming at great things, and nobly aspiring to do much good, and to be "holy as God is holy."

V. 12—20. The consideration, that the Lord "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," should reconcile us even to those afflictive dispensations, which seem to preclude us from usefulness. Whatever Satan or wicked men may intend or expect, our God can further the success of his gospel, by the very events which arise from men's endeavours to stop its progress. He often works by apparent contraries, and his most able ministers have been immured in prisons; that their "bonds in Christ" might bring the knowledge of his truth into the courts of justice, nay, even into the palaces of princes; (Note, Matt. 10:16—18. Mark 13:9—13.) and the blood of the martyrs has more abundantly made fruitful the good seed of the word of God. Nay, the extremest sufferings and cruel death of his saints, instead of intimidating, have infused courage into their brethren, while they witnessed the triumphant consolations of the happy sufferers. Indeed, Satan will endeavour to prevent these blessed effects, even by stirring up men to "preach the gospel" from unworthy motives: and not only have ambition and avarice moved immense numbers to take this sacred office upon them; but envy, malice, and contention have done the same: and Christ and his truth have often been preached, in order to grieve, perplex, or expose to enmity and persecution his faithful suffering servants! So varied are the effects of human depravity! We should indeed grieve to see "tares sown in the Lord's field," and the souls of men deceived by "damnable heresies:" but when the substance of the truth is preached among ignorant persons, we should neither so much regard our own reputation, or that of our party, nor be so concerned about the motives of the persons employed, as not to rejoice if even a

CHAPTER II.

The apostle, by the most affecting topics, exhorts his brethren to humble, condescending, and self-denying love, 1—4; after the example of Christ, in his incarnation, humiliation, and death on the cross, as introductory to his glorious exaltation, 5—11. He exhorts to diligence, "in working out their own salvation," as depending on the grace of God, 12, 13; and to profess the gospel, and adorn it among their neighbours, by a harmless and blameless example; in such a manner, that he might rejoice with them at the day of Christ, in the success of his labours, 14—16. He assures them that he should joyfully become a martyr for their sakes; and exhorts them to rejoice with him, 17, 18. He hopes to send Timothy to them shortly, whom he highly commends, 19—23; as he does also Epaphroditus, their messenger to him; who had been sick, and was grieved that they had heard it; and who, as God had mercifully restored him, longed to return to them, 24—27. The apostle therefore sends him back; and exhorts them highly to value him and such as he, seeing he had "disregarded his life, to supply their lack of service," 28—30.

by such means sinners are brought acquainted with the all-gracious Saviour. (Note, Mark 9:38—40.) The painful and vexatious circumstances, which sometimes attend these transactions, will "turn to our salvation," if we bear them in a proper manner; through "the supply of the Spirit of Christ," granted in answer to the prayers made for us and by us. Our "earnest expectation and hope" should be, not to be honoured by men, or to escape the cross; but to be so upheld amidst contempt and affliction, that we may not be put to shame, or disgrace the cause of God; and that we may act with such boldness and constancy, amidst dangers and enemies, that "Christ may be magnified in our bodies," whether by our laborious services and protracted sufferings, or by the honourable conclusion of our work and warfare. (Notes, Rom. 6:12,13,16—19. 12:1. 1 Cor. 6:18—20.)

V. 21—30, We are most of us very far from having made that progress in the divine life which holy Paul had; yet, if true believers, we habitually consider Christ as "our Life." Our main interest, work, honour, and comfort in this world are centered in him; and his glory is the great end to which we would direct all our conduct. In proportion to the depth of our experience in this respect, should be our well-grounded assurance, that to "die will be our gain." If we have this earnest of our inheritance, death can take us away from nothing but what is vain, vexatious, defiling, ensnaring, and utterly insufficient for our felicity: and it will convey us to the fountain-head of those holy joys, which here we relished, and from time to time had tastes of, but were never able to participate without alloy or interruption: and what a blessedness must that be, which can render death the richest gain, and make us long earnestly for the approach of "the king of terrors," as the messenger of our Father, to put us in possession of our eternal inheritance!—How cold and heartless, compared with this, are philosophy's applauded antidotes against the fear of death! We cannot read even Cicero on this subject, without feeling that his vigorous genius languishes for want of interesting topics; and that he at last advances nothing which can at all satisfy the mind, in the prospect of dissolution and of an unexplored eternal state. We should, however, be willing to live in this evil world, if the Lord see good: this will retard, but it will also increase, our complete felicity, if our days be spent in diligent labours, and patient sufferings for Christ's sake. We need not wish to choose in this respect; for we should not know what choice to make. It is blessed indeed to be in that "strait between two," which the apostle described: to "have a longing desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better;" and yet to be willing to abide in the flesh, in order, if the Lord pleases, to be helpful to the faith and holy joy of our brethren: and indeed it is well worth while living for years in pain and suffering, if by that means we may promote the cause for which Christ shed his blood upon the cross. Yet, it can hardly be expected, that all believers should be found thus superior to the love of life, and the fear of death; and thus willing to live and suffer, from love to their brethren, when assured of their own salvation. Nor should we "despise the day of small things," either in ourselves or others; though we should press forward to this full assurance of hope, this fervour of longing grateful love, and this entire submission to the Lord's will. But nothing can harm us, if we "only let our conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ." In that case, all changes, personal or relative, in the church or in the world, "will work together for our good." This then should be our primary personal concern: and all the company of believers, however divided and subdivided, should consider themselves as one great army; and endeavour to "stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel;" and to recommend the salvation of Christ to all around them, and diffuse the knowledge of it to "every creature under heaven," as far as possible. In such a cause, we should not allow ourselves to be "terrified by any adversaries:" for their reproaches and menaces against those who thus serve Christ, are a manifest proof, that they are in the broad road to destruction, as they hate the truth and image of God in his people. This enmity of ungodly men against us, for Christ's sake, when we love and are beloved by the brethren; is "an evident token" to us, that we partake of salvation by the grace of God; as both friends and foes discern his seal upon us: and to us "it is given, in the behalf of Christ," to believe the same truths, to love and suffer in the same holy cause, and to endure the same conflict, which prophets, apostles, and martyrs have maintained before us.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—4. (Notes, 1:27—30. Eph. 4:1—6.) The apostle evidently deemed harmony among Christians essential to "a conversation becoming the gospel." He therefore speaks to this effect: 'By all the consolation and animating motives derived from Christ; from the pardon of your sins and your deliverance from "the slavery of sin and Satan," from the love of Christ and communion with him, from the fellowship of the sanctifying Spirit, from the favour of God and the hopes and anticipations of heaven; by all the sweet comforts arising from the very exercise of love, I beseech and exhort you, if the Lord has manifested his tender compassions towards you; if you have any feeling for your spiritual father, now also "a prisoner for your sakes:" or any for your brethren in Christ, redeemed by the same Saviour, heirs of the same heaven, and sufferers from the same trials and conflicts with yourselves; "fulfil ye my joy,"—the joy that I felt at your conversion, and now feel in remembering and praying for you, (Note, 1:3—6.)—by living together in entire peace and harmony.' (Marg. Ref. b—e.)—'If any force of exhortation, in ... the name of Christ.' Whithy. The original word signifies exhortation, as well as consolation, or rather an encouraging and animating exhortation. The authority of Christ, speaking by his apostle, as well as the consolation derived from him, seems implied. (Marg. Ref. a.)—The expressions which follow are varied, to include all that can be imagined, in the most cordial amity, unity, and sympathy. Let them live together as members of one body animated by one soul; (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—26. 13:4—7.) let their common love to Christ, and delight in his holy service, unite them in love to each other; let them be "of one accord" in every undertaking to promote the common cause; and let them seek in behalf of themselves and each other, that degree of spiritual illumination, which might make them of "one judgment," and of the same sentiments as much as possible. (Note, 1 Cor. 1:4—9.) But, as differences in some things might take place: and even in conducting the concerns of the church, some would judge more favourably of persons or measures than others; of which Satan would take advantage, in order to distrub their harmony: let them all watch themselves and each other, that they did nothing from self-will, a contentious temper, or an ambitious desire of obtaining applause, influence, or superiority. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Gal. 5:22—26. Jam. 3:13—18.) On the other hand, let them see to it, that they were actuated by a humble spirit, and that, from a consciousness of the evils in their heart and conduct, which others could not observe, and from candour to their brethren, they were ever ready to deem others more deserving esteem than themselves. In many cases this could not be done, in respect of talents or spiritual gifts, though self-flattery and vainglory in these things also would readily and dangerously intrude: but if the endowments, and the obligations connected with them, were properly estimated, they would rather conduce to humble than to exalt them; even as the apostle spake of his knowledge in the mystery of Christ, when he deemed himself less than the least of all saints. (Marg. Ref k. Notes, Rom. 12:3—8. Eph. 3:1—8.) They ought not, therefore, to regard either their own attainments, or interests, or credit, or inclinations, alone or principally; but in humble

V. 5—8. To illustrate and enforce, in the most effectual manner, that conduct which he had recommended, the apostle here called on Christians to cultivate and manifest the same mind, judgment, and disposition, which had been so conspicuous in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. m. Note, Rom. 8:5—9.) He had been "in the form of God;" he appeared in divine majesty and glory, as the Creator and Lord of all, in the heaven of heavens, and all the angels worshipped him as God, One with and coequal to the Father. He had manifested himself, as JEHOVAH, to patriarchs, prophets, and the church of Israel, through successive ages; and had not thought it "a robbery to be equal with God," and to receive divine adoration from men. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, Gen. 16:10,11. 32:30. 48:16. Ex. 3:2,14. Josh. 5:13—15.) To this he was conscious of having a full right, without in the least interfering with the honour due to the eternal Father. Nevertheless, he "emptied," or impoverished himself. He divested himself of his divine glory, that he might appear on earth, like one of no dignity or reputation; as princes sometimes travel without the insignia of royalty, and are not known from private persons. He did not come down from heaven "in the form of God," as when he gave the law from mount Sinai; he appeared not like himself, "the Lord of Glory," but "in the form of a servant," even of the lowest "servant." (Marg. Ref. p, q.) As he was really "a Servant" to the Father, when in "the form of a servant," so was he really God when "in the form of God." By this voluntary susception of a new character, in order to man's salvation, "he was made in the likeness of men;" he assumed our nature, and became "like us in all things but sin." (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Rom. 8:1,2. Gal. 4:4—7, v. 4. Heb. 2:5—18.) Thus the Only begotten of the Father tabernacled here on earth "in fashion as a man," being truly Man but more than man at the same time: (Notes, John 1:1—14.) and he was pleased still more to abase himself, by submitting to the most indigent circumstances, and the most accumulated hardships for our salvation: especially "he became obedient" to the whole divine law, as our Surety, and "fulfilled all righteousness," amidst inconceivable difficulties and temptations. In this he persevered to the end: and, his voluntary obligations requiring it of him, he submitted to suffer death, even that of crucifixion, the most ignominious, tormenting, and accursed kind of execution, to which the vilest of malefactors were condemned: and he was most perfectly resigned and obedient to the Father, through all the inward agony, and multiplied indignities and cruelties, which he endured. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) Thus low he voluntarily stooped, from that "glory which he had with the Father before the world was." (Note, John 17:4,5.) He not only abased himself to become man; but he denied and humbled himself as man, to the very depth of suffering and shame; from love to rebels and enemies who justly deserved to perish! (Note, 2 Cor. 8:9.) The example can never be done justice to by human language; and all our imitation of such immense condescension, compassion, self-abasement, self-denial, and liberal, laborious, forgiving, patient, suffering love, must necessarily fall infinitely short of it. In this view of the subject, how important and energetic is the apostle's argument! How striking is the illustration!—But Socinians and others have laboured to prove, that the apostle only meant, that 'the Man Jesus, though he acted as the Ambassador and Representative of God, did not think of robbing him of his glory, by claiming equality with God!' Now, this would sink the meaning, not only into insipidity, but absurdity: for it would propose as an example of the most perfect love, self-denial, and humility, a bare exemption from the most horrible impiety and ambition imaginable! as certainly it must be such, for a mere creature, in any possible circumstances, to harbour a thought of aspiring to equality in honour and majesty with the infinite God. Indeed this sense cannot be consistent with our Lord's frequent and most express declarations concerning himself. (John 5:17,18,23. 8:58. 10:30—33. 14:9,10.) Nay, the whole interpretation of the passage must be forced and unnatural: the reality of our Lord's human nature, "in the likeness of man," and "in fashion as a man," might as justly be questioned, as the reality of his Deity, who "was in the form of God:" and his "taking upon him the form of a servant," and "becoming obedient," are unmeaning words upon the Socinian interpretation, but exceedingly emphatical upon that before proposed. —On a portion of Scripture which is of so great importance, both in respect of its general import, and also in the argument concerning our Lord's Deity; and which, at the same time, has been perplexed by discordant interpretations, more than most other passages; something additional may be properly adduced. 'Who does not perceive, that Paul declares what Christ was, before he assumed "the form of a servant?" ... Christ himself when he was God, and consequently in that glory and majesty which belong to God alone; and when he did not think that he usurped any thing not belonging to him; yet, as laying aside this glory, abased himself even so far, as to become such as the servants of God are, that is, to "become man:" yea, and then also he conducted himself towards the Father, not as towards his equal, but his Lord; so that he voluntarily submitted to undergo the most ignominious death! And shall not we, mortal and mean slaves, be ashamed of our arrogance, in acting as if we excelled our brethren? This, I say, is Paul's argument, than which nothing can be more weighty and forcible. ... "He thought it no robbery." Or, as a most learned interpreter renders it, "He did not think it a prey to be seized on." For he refers that which follows to the manifestation made in the flesh; that this should be the meaning:—Christ, as God, possessed of eternal glory and majesty, knew indeed that it was just and lawful for him to appear, not in humble flesh, but with a dignity worthy of God: but he chose rather to abase himself. ... But, I think that this also belongs to the pristine glory of Christ, which he mentions, John 17:5. and that this is the meaning: Christ, when possessed of that eternal glory of Deity was not ignorant, that in this thing, (that is, in being coequal with God the Father,) he did no injury to any one, but used his own right: nevertheless he, as it were, receded from his right, when he reduced himself even to nothing, by "taking on him the form of a servant."' Beza.—The word, rendered robbery, is not found in any other place in the New Testament, and but very seldom in other writers; yet the derivation of it fixes it to the meaning given to it in our translation. The word, rendered equal, is ισα, not ισον; and many have argued from this circumstance, that similitude not equality is meant: but the learned bishop Pearson has shown, that ισα, especially used with ειναι, may express equality as well as ισον.—Socinus inquires, 'How can God be said to be equal to himself?' To this, it may be answered, that the Son may be equal to the Father, in the unity of the Godhead, which is all that the apostle's language implies, and all that Trinitarians contend for: nor can this be denied, without begging the question, and denying that there is any distinction of Persons in the unity of the Godhead.—'He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant; being made in the likeness of men.' Thus bishop Pearson literally translates the seventh verse.—If any man doubt how Christ "emptied himself," the text will satisfy him; By "taking on him the form of a servant:" and if any still question, how he "took on him the form of a servant," he has the apostle's answer; By "being made in the likeness of men."—Here it may be observed, that if Christ had originally been a creature of God, he must have also been his servant, before his incarnation: and this is conclusive against the Arians, as well as the Socinians.—So afterwards, "Being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." As therefore his humiliation consisted in his obedience unto death; so his emptying himself, consisted in "taking on him the form of a servant," and that in the nature of man. The clauses are connected in the original, not by way of conjunction, in which there might be some diversity; but by way of opposition, which signifies a clear identity. The grand point, in order to understand the passage, is this, to determine in what sense Christ "was in the form of God," and how "he emptied himself:" and the above remarks, suggested by bishop Pearson's learned and able disquisitions on the passage, and sometimes in his words, give, as it appears to me, the most complete satisfaction. (Note, Matt. 17:1,2.)—The passage indeed is full to the point, as to our Lord's Deity; and all, who oppose this construction of it, are evidently baffled in the argument: so that after all their efforts, it stands unmoved, as the deep-rooted rocks amidst the raging billows

But had some deeper impression been made on it, the Bible would still afford the humble believer abundant proof of this "great Mystery of godliness," on which every well-grounded human hope must be established. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.)

V. 9—11. When the eternal Word, "the Son of God," had fulfilled his engagements as our incarnate Surety; God the Father "most highly exalted him," in our nature, by advancing him to the mediatorial throne. For the two circumstances, that it is Christ, as Man, who is thus exalted, and that he is exalted as Mediator, renders this perfectly consistent with his external glory and dominion, as "God over all, blessed for evermore." (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, John 5:20—23.) The absolute kingdom of the Creator; and the mediatorial kingdom of the Redeemer, established for the benefit and salvation of rebels against the Creator, who are condemned by his law, must be distinguished. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) It was in consequence of the engagements of the eternal Son, that the reign of mercy was introduced. (Note, John 1:17.) For this "joy set before him, he endured the cross, &c." (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) Nothing could be deducted from his authority, as God, nor any thing added to it: but it did not consist with the honour of the divine law and justice, to deal with men, except through a Mediator, who was One with the Father; and One with them, their Surety, Sacrifice, and Intercessor. The mediatorial kingdom alone was "given" to Christ, and given to him as Man: but had he not been God also, and possessed of all divine perfections, how could he possibly have administered it? (Note, Matt. 28:18.) Thus God the Father "gave him a name," and a degree of honour and authority, above that of every other name; so that no created being ever was or could be so honoured, as he was, who had been "the Man of sorrows," and was crucified between two thieves! (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, Eph. 1:9—12, 15—23.) Insomuch that "at the name of Jesus," the name given to a poor Babe, born in a stable, and laid in the manger, (because that Babe was Emmanuel, "God with us," that Child born, that Son given, was the "mighty God,") "every knee should bow" in submission and adoration. (Notes, Matt. 1:20—23. Luke 2:8—14. Rev. 5:11—14.) That is, all rational creatures should either willingly adore him; or be punished as the enemies of God and his kingdom. This includes angels and saints in heaven, men on earth, the bodies of the dead who are under the earth, the souls of the wicked in a separate state; and indeed all the principalities and powers of darkness. In short, "every tongue shall confess," every creature must, one way or another, acknowledge, "that Jesus Christ is Lord," the Lord of all, "the Lord of glory," יהוה JEHOVAH, the Saviour: and this will be so far from interfering with the honour of God the Father, (as Antitrinitarians object,) that it will be to his glory. For "He and the Father are One:" and the whole Deity is more displayed and glorified, in the Person and Redemption of Christ, before the whole universe, than by all other divine operations and discoveries: so that all the honour and worship which is rendered to the Person of the Son, as "God manifest in the flesh," is virtually rendered to the Godhead, through the medium of his humanity, by which alone sinners can know, approach, or worship the infinite God. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, 1:9—11, v. 11. Ps. 2:10—12. Is. 45:20—25. Rom. 14:10—12.)—"Surely in JEHOVAH have I righteousness and strength." This is the language, which both here and in the parallel passage in Romans, the apostle applies to Jesus; when he says, "Every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord." Can his meaning be doubted?

V. 12, 13. As the Philippians, whom the apostle addressed in the language of cordial love, had so endearing and encouraging an example set before their eyes; let them persevere in copying it as they had hitherto done. They had always been prompt "to obey" the will of Christ, made known by his apostle, not merely while he abode among them, but even with increasing attention after he had left them: and he greatly desired and earnestly exhorted them, that they should now, in his absence, labour diligently in all the means of grace, and in the performance of every duty, to obtain more complete deliverance from the power of sin, by the renewal of their souls to holiness. Thus they should "work out their own salvation with fear and trembling," lest any of them "should seem to come short of the promised rest," and be proved to "have no root in themselves," by "falling away in the hour of temptation;" lest by negligence they should lose their comfort, and subject themselves to darkness and terror at the approach of death; or lest they should dishonour God, and prejudice men against the gospel, by falling into scandalous sins. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Heb. 4:1,2. 12:15—17.)—'The phrase, ("with fear and trembling,") in other places of these books, seems to imply, . . . not only lowliness of mind; but diligence, and caution, and solicitude, and fear of displeasing.' Hammond. (Marg. Ref. k.)—'Though we are freely saved in Christ alone, apprehended by faith: yet we must press forward unto salvation in the way of righteousness; seeing that the sons of God are led by the Spirit of him by whom they are justified, that they may walk in good works.' Beza.—"Salvation" here signifies, not justification, either exclusively or primarily; but deliverance from sin and all its consequences; which must be, and will be, diligently and vigilantly laboured for by all the regenerate, as long as any sin remains in them; and this salvation will not be in all things completed, till "death shall be swallowed up in victory." (Note, Rom. 13: 11—14, v. 11.) The righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ have made "all things ready" for our salvation; the gospel calls us to partake of it; the regenerating Spirit of Christ quickens us when dead in sin, and brings us to repentance and faith. Thus excited and animated, we first diligently seek for an interest in Christ: next to "make our calling and election sure;" and then, for "the full assurance of hope unto the end." (Notes, Heb. 6:11,12. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.) In this way of diligence we also receive daily more and more of "salvation" itself, by liberty from sin, victory over it, peace and communion with God, and the earnests of heavenly felicity; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:8,9.) and at the same time we glorify God, adorn the gospel, are useful to our brethren, and "shine as lights in the world."—In doing these things the Philippians were exhorted to consider, that God was even then working in them that willingness to repent, believe, and obey, of which they were conscious; and that ability to reduce their good desires to effect, which their past conduct evinced. In this, he had acted according to his purpose of "good-will to men;" and what they had experienced in this matter should animate them to more vigorous exertions, and direct them to depend wholly on God to enable them for every good work. (Marg. Ref. l—n.)—To will, &c. (13) 'We are not therefore stocks, but are willing in doing well: not that God helps the imbecility of our will; but that from being evil he makes it good, and that wholly of his grace.' Beza.—And to do.] 'He does not say, that we may have the faculty of willing, and doing well if we will: but he says, that the efficacious gift of willing and doing well is bestowed on us.' Beza. This shows the nature of divine influences upon the mind; according to the constitution of the rational nature, and not against it; by producing in us "a willing mind," to use all means of obtaining help and deliverance, and not by driving or constraining us against our will. By the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, the mind and heart are prepared, to discern and love truth and holiness; the gospel sets objects before us, and proposes them to us, suited to this new state of mind and heart; and we accordingly "choose" them, without the least infringement of our liberty. We feel no force, we are perfectly voluntary; we act according to our present feelings and desires, as if the whole were from ourselves: and perhaps it is not till long after, that we learn from what Author and Source the revolution in our judgment and affections, which led to "newness of life," originated: nay, numbers cannot clearly discern this, during their subsequent earthly course. In short, "the carnal mind is enmity against God;" all are by nature "carnally minded;" none are of themselves "willing" to repent and believe the gospel, according to the word of God; none can be compelled to do these things against their will; but "God works in us to will and to do of his good pleasure." 'The grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will.' (Art. x.) If the opposers of the doctrine, improperly called Calvinistic, in former and later times, had been willing and able to understand those against whom they have contended and still contend, it would have saved them immense labour, in combating sentiments, which few comparatively maintain, in the sense which they seem to suppose. One of these opposers, however, has repeatedly quoted, operatur in vobis velle, as one of Calvin's dreadful dogmas, when it is the vulgate translation, and an exact version of St. Paul's words, which we render, "worketh in us to will!" In fact, our zealous opponents are not unfrequently betrayed into similar mistakes. "He worketh in us effectually; ... that we may effectually work."—The man, in whom God has wrought effectually to will, and who yet cannot fully accomplish what he wills, but earnestly cries to God to help and deliver him, is evidently described by the apostle. (Notes, Rom. 7:12—25.)

V. 14—18. In all their concerns, whether secular or religious, the Christians at Philippi were exhorted to avoid every kind of "murmuring" against the appointments of God, and "grudging" of one another; and all angry controversies and reasonings, and ambitious competitions for pre-eminence. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Note, 1—4.) Thus they would be "blameless," and not liable to be accused by their neighbours, as contentious, selfish, deceitful, or injurious; their whole conduct would be "harmless" and inoffensive, as well as benevolent; and they would appear to be "the children of God," by the purity, equity, and love exhibited in their characters. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Eph. 5:1,2.) They would escape the reproach and censure of observers: and their bold profession of the gospel in the face of persecutors, joined with their holy conversation and spiritual worship, would cause them to "shine" amidst their immoral, idolatrous, and licentious countrymen, as "lights in the world." The words may be rendered as the imperative, "Shine ye, &c." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Is. 60:1—3. Matt. 5:14—16.)—The nation indeed, to which they belonged, was "crooked, deceitful, injurious, and perverse;" which appeared in their conduct towards one another, as well as in their persecution of the Christians: but the doctrine and example of consistent believers would tend to enlighten them, and to direct their way to Christ and holiness; even as the lighthouse warns the mariners to avoid the rocks, and directs their course into the harbour; or as the luminaries of heaven enlighten the earth. This must be attempted not only by "holding fast" the truth; but by "holding forth the word of life," in their profession, discourse, public ordinances, and holy actions. In this manner they would certainly be "saved themselves," and be instruments of "saving others;" and the good work, begun among them, would be diffused widely, and perpetuated to other generations. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Note, John 15:12—16. P. O. 9—16.) This would enable the apostle to anticipate the joy reserved for him "in the day of Christ," when it would appear, that his labours at Philippi had not been fruitless, and that he had not run as one that loses the race. And provided their faith, and its blessed fruits, were thus presented in Christ Jesus, as an acceptable and honourable sacrifice and service to God; if he should be offered on that sacrifice, by the shedding of his blood, as a martyr in the glorious cause, as the drink-offerings were poured upon the sacrifices, (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z—b.) he would be so far from regretting this event, that he would rejoice at thus suffering for the confirmation of their faith; and "congratulate them," yea, share their happiness, even while enduring the agonies of death. He would not therefore have them be troubled on his account; but rather rejoice with him, and for him, as a very happy man, even in his imprisonment, and in the prospect of a violent death! (Marg. Ref. c—e.)—Nothing can exceed the genuine magnanimity and disinterested love, expressed in this most beautiful passage. The Athenian who came mortally wounded from the battle of Marathon, with news of a glorious victory, and having said to the Rulers, 'Rejoice ye, we rejoice,' (χαιρετε, χαιρομεν,) then dropped down dead before them, has been greatly admired, and justly, as a patriot and a hero: but in the view of a future and eternal world, it does not appear that his joy was rational. "He did it for a corruptible crown," the apostle for "an incorruptible," to himself and multitudes.

V. 19—23. The apostle did not suppose that he was directly to suffer death: and he "trusted in the Lord Jesus," in whose hand all hearts and events were, that he should be enabled "shortly to send Timothy" to inquire into the state of their souls, and that of the church: the result of which, he was persuaded, would conduce to his comfort. He had selected him for this service, because he had, at that time, no one with him of so excellent a spirit as Timothy, and so entirely coincident with himself in his views and aims; or who would be concerned for their welfare, with so prudent, tender, and assiduous an affection, like the natural love of parents to their children. For all sought their own ease, safety, interest, credit, or indulgence; which often interfered with the work, honour, and cause of Christ. (Marg and Marg. Ref. f—l.) Probably, this was wholly the case with several, who had offered their assistance to Paul, but had declined difficult and perilous services; others, perhaps, had rendered themselves suspected, by the same selfish conduct; and most concerned had given the apostle cause for dissatisfaction, by preferring easier and more secure services, to those of far greater importance, but connected with more self-denial, labour, and peril. It may be supposed, that several of his most approved helpers were absent on other services, and others might be fully employed at Rome: but, after all deductions and limitations, the apostle's complaint must stand, as a lamentable testimony to the selfishness of human nature.—The Christians at Philippi, however, had already had experimental proof of Timothy; and they well knew that he had imbibed the very mind of the apostle, as "his genuine son in the faith;" and that he was ever ready to enter into his views, to concur in his measures, to observe his directions, to consult his comfort, and to labour, venture, and suffer in the cause of Christ; and in serving with him, to make known the gospel, "as a son with his father." (Marg. Ref. m, n.) But, he deemed it better not to send him, till he knew how his own cause would be decided, which he continually expected to come on before the Emperor's tribunal. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—The words, "trust in the Lord Jesus," as introduced with reference to a providential concern, and not any thing immediately relating to his salvation and grace, should not pass 23 Him therefore I hope to send presently, [o]so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.

24 But [p]I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly.

25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you [q]Epaphroditus, [r]my brother, [s]and companion in labour, [t]and fellow-soldier, [u]but your messenger, [x]and he that ministered to my wants.

26 For [y]he longed after you all, and was [z]full of heaviness, because that [a]ye had heard that he had been sick.

27 For indeed he was sick [b]nigh unto death: [c]but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, [d]but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, [e]and that I may be the less sorrowful.

29 [f]Receive him therefore in the Lord [h]with all gladness; [i]and [k]hold such in reputation.

30 Because for [k]the work of Christ he was [l]nigh unto death, not regarding his life, [m]to supply your lack of service toward me.

unnoticed. Perhaps the most satisfactory assurance of our Lord's Deity, may be obtained by carefully noting such words, as seem to drop without design from the pen of the sacred writers, and which are seldom noticed in the controversy; but which can in no other way be reconciled to the other Scriptures. (Notes, Ps. 146:3,4. Jer. 17:5—8. Eph. 1:9—14.) This shows, that Timothy had been at Philippi with the apostle; yet the history does not expressly mention it: (Notes, Acts 16:6—40.) but, by carefully comparing one part of the narrative with another, this appears evidently to have been the case. (Acts 16:1—3. 17:14,15.) Undesigned coincidences of this kind, between the history and the Epistles, prove that both are genuine; and if genuine, then inspired.

V. 24—30. The apostle was satisfied, as "trusting in the Lord," that he should speedily regain his liberty, and be enabled to pay the Philippians another visit. But before he could either spare Timothy, or come himself; he judged it necessary to send Epaphroditus, whom he owned as a "brother, a companion in labour, and a fellow-soldier," and whom they had sent as "their messenger," to bring him a supply to his urgent necessities. (Marg. Ref. p—x. Notes, 4:10—20.) Probably, Epaphroditus was a pastor of the church at Philippi; and, being absent from his stated charge, "he longed after" the people, and his labours of love among them: especially he "was in heaviness, because they had heard" of his sickness, and the thought of their sorrow, on his account, was more painful to him than his own sickness! (Marg. Ref. y—a.) What a beautiful and admirable instance of genuine sensibility and affection is here most simply exhibited! In what book, except the Scriptures, do we meet with such?—Indeed, Epaphroditus had been very dangerously ill; but God had graciously restored him for further usefulness; and in this he had shown mercy to the apostle also: to whom it would have been an additional sorrow, if so excellent a person had lost his life, by ministering to him in his bonds. (Marg. Ref. b—d.)—It does not appear, that any miracle was wrought in this case; and we may thence infer, that the gift of miracles could only be exercised on particular occasions, of which those endued with them had some previous intimation. This is clearly indicated: and it shows, that the apostle was as ready to own his want of power when truth required it, as to speak of his miracles when needful.—On account therefore of the late sickness of Epaphroditus, the apostle had been the more careful to send him back; that the joy of the Philippians might be increased, by seeing their beloved minister in health again: for the very thought of that joy would alleviate his sorrows, though at a distance from them; and though by that means he lost Epaphroditus's assistance and company. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) He would, therefore, have them "to receive him," for the Lord's sake, with all expressions of thankful joy; and to esteem and highly honour, such affectionate laborious ministers. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:12—15.) For indeed the sickness of Epaphroditus had been the effect of his excess of diligence in the work of Christ: as he had not even "regarded his life;" that, in the place of the absent Philippians, he might render every possible service to the apostle, both in his personal concerns, and in those relating to the propagation of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. g—m.)—As Philippi lay at a great distance from Rome; Epaphroditus must have continued with the apostle a considerable time; or the report of his sickness at Rome could not have reached Philippi, and that of their sorrow have reached Rome before Epaphroditus left that city; and consequently the epistle must have been written towards the close of the apostle's two years' imprisonment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. All our consolations, hopes, and experience of "the fellowship of the Spirit, and the bowels and mercies" of God our Saviour, as well as all our regard to our own peace, should engage us to be "of one mind" with our brethren, and so "to fulfil the joy" of all wise and faithful ministers and Christians. Nothing so honours Christ, defeats the machinations of his enemies, or fills the soul with consolation, as this holy love; but envy, contention, and ambition, not only disturb the peace of the church, but torture the soul which entertains them. Neither inward nor outward peace can be enjoyed, except in proportion as "in lowliness of mind we esteem others better than ourselves, and look at the things of others as well as at our own." These are hard sayings to the proud and carnal heart of man. Many have learned the doctrines of the gospel very accurately, who have not "thus learned Christ." (Note, Eph. 4:20—24.) We cannot study this subject successfully, except by continually "looking unto Jesus:" but while faith penetrates the veil of sensible objects, and contemplates the Saviour "in the form of God, and thinking it no robbery to be equal with God;" yet making himself of no reputation, assuming the form of a servant, and the nature of man; appearing as an infant in the manger, as a poor carpenter at Nazareth, as an indigent and despised preacher in Galilee and Judea; as "obedient to the law" during his life, and as an insulted criminal at his death upon the cross: when these things are contemplated, and the height of his essential glory is contrasted with the depth of his voluntary abasement, and with the motives and effects of this stupendous transaction; we see such obligations and encouragements to self-denying love, as the whole universe besides can never supply: and "beholding, as in a glass, this glory of our Lord, we are" gradually "changed into his image." (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:17,18. Heb. 12:2,3.) And while we contemplate his subsequent exaltation, and "the name given" to this lowly sufferer, "above every name," we learn to abase ourselves that we may be exalted, to serve others in order to our own best interest, and "to labour and suffer reproach," that we may ensure "glory, honour, and immortality." But, "as every knee must bow to Christ," as "every tongue must confess him to be Lord, to the glory of God the Father;" let us examine whether we do indeed thus reverence, love, obey, and worship the incarnate Son of God: or whether we are yet among those enemies, who must be bruised under his feet shortly. (Note and P. O. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.)

V. 12—18. Even those professed Christians, of whom we have the most favourable opinion, should be exhorted not only to "be obedient," as in the presence of their pastors; but to increase in circumspection, when removed from under their faithful care. Thus ought we all to "work out our own salvation," with jealous fear and humble caution; waiting for "the full assurance of hope," and the renewal of our souls to holiness, in the way of simple dependence, diligent obedience, and assiduous humble attendance on the ordinances of God: thanking him for "working in us" the willing mind, and fervently calling upon him for grace still more effectually to incline our hearts, and increase our decided willingness; and to enable us to perform the duties incumbent on us.—Surely some zealous advocates for evangelical truths have never read this chapter, for they can do nothing "without murmurings and disputings!" These are their element; these are the unhallowed "weapons of their warfare." How can they be "blameless and harmless," on this plan, when "envy and strife" are inseparable from "confusion and every evil work?"

CHAPTER III.

The apostle exhorts to joy in the Lord, and gives cautions against false teachers, 1, 2; shows that the church of real Christians are the true "circumcision," 3; and that he had better grounds of carnal confidence, than most of those who trusted in the law, or inward distinctions, 4—6; but he had learned to count all his gain loss for Christ; yea, that he still counted all things, as loss and dung, compared with the knowledge of Christ, and "the righteousness of God by faith" in him, 7—9; desiring also to know the power of his resurrection, and to be conformed to him, even in suffering and death; if so be he might attain to the resurrection of the just, 10, 11. He owns, that he was not yet "perfected;" but that he anxiously and earnestly sought "the high prize of his calling," 12—14. He exhorts to an imitation of his example, 15—17; as many, professing Christianity, "walked after the flesh," in the way of destruction, 18, 19; with whom he contrasts true Christians, their heavenly conversation, and their expectation of Christ to raise their "vile body," and render it "like to his glorified body," 20, 21.

[a]FINALLY, my brethren, [b]rejoice in the Lord. [c]To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe.

And how can they think themselves the "children of God," who in so many features bear the express image of Satan? But let us pray to be made peaceable, humble, unambitious, and inoffensive, both in the church and in the community, that "by well doing we may put to silence" the calumnies of ungodly men: and that we may be "without rebuke" in the midst of this our nation; which alas! is proved to be "crooked and perverse," by the prevalence of infidelity, impiety, and every kind of immorality, under a Christian profession, and abundant means of religious instruction! Let us then endeavour to "shine" among our neighbours, "as lights in the world," and to "hold forth the word of life" in our families and circle, by an open profession of evangelical truth, connected with a holy conversation. Then the ministers, who have preached the gospel, will anticipate their "rejoicing in the day of Christ," assured that it will appear, that "they did not run in vain, nor labour in vain," and hoping that far more extensive and permanent good was done, than they lived to witness. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15. P. O. 12—18.) In such a prospect, a zealous servant of Christ would be animated to a readiness for death in his Master's cause; while the exultation of faith and grace would conquer nature's reluctance to suffering: and certainly they, who have been thus "offered upon the sacrifice" of their brethren's faith, are to be considered as objects of peculiar congratulation, for they have almost universally died rejoicing and triumphant.

V. 19—30. Alas! in the best times, how few are "like-minded" with the apostles, and "naturally care" for the state of the church, and of their fellow-Christians! For while numbers, evidently and wholly, seek their own interest, reputation, ease, or indulgence, "and not the things of Jesus Christ;" we are all too attentive to personal concerns, and often allow them to interfere with our usefulness. So that a man, who is ready to engage, even in a service of great importance, where no emolument or credit can be expected, and in which losses, hardships, perils, and sufferings must be encountered, is deemed a prodigy, and rather an object of astonishment, not to say censure and pity, than of imitation. If then the apostle made this grievous complaint concerning the ministers of Christianity, in his days; what would he say, were he now on earth, to witness and give his sentiments and judgment on the whole body of professed Christian ministers, of all ranks, and titles, and names, in these degenerate times! What language could do justice to his deep but mingled feelings!—But, let us seek deliverance from this mean regard to our own ease, interest, or accommodation, by an increase of zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men: that those who best "know the proof of us" may perceive, that we should have been ready to serve with Paul, in all his self-denying labours, like dutiful sons with an honoured father. In this manner young ministers should attach themselves to the most faithful, zealous, and useful of their seniors; to learn, as it were, the science and skill of the spiritual warfare under such veteran and experienced soldiers: and thus aged ministers should communicate their views to their younger brethren; and endeavour also to instil into them those principles of activity, by which they have been excited to self-denying, disinterested diligence in the work of the Lord; that they may be able to introduce them into useful services, as their companions in labour, and approved fellow-soldiers.—What an ingenuous spirit does the gospel inspire! The most eminent ministers, who most simply "trust the Lord Jesus" for every thing, will yet frankly acknowledge their obligations for temporal assistance to those, who owe their salvation to their labours of love. The affectionate pastor will be more full of heaviness, for the grief of his people on his account, than for his own pain and sickness: and he will "long after them," and to renew his labours among them, as a tender mother does after her beloved infant.—The Lord often afflicts such zealous and affectionate Christians, to manifest the excellency of their disposition; but he "will have mercy upon them," and not let them "have sorrow upon sorrow:" and they will readily put themselves to inconveniences to remove the grief or increase the comfort of their brethren; rejoicing, though at a distance, in the thoughts of their joy, as an alleviation of their own sorrow. Those ministers who thus spend their strength, and disregard even life and health in his cause, and to "supply the lack of service" of those who are incapable of performing it; should be peculiarly honoured by the church, and by every Christian: yet none should, without necessity, be kept very long from the people of their own peculiar charge.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—7. The apostle deemed it needful to close the preceding practical exhortations, by calling on his brethren at Philippi to "rejoice in the Lord" Jesus, and in their relation to him, as their Glory and Salvation. (Note, 4:4.) This he had often inculcated by various methods, and it was not difficult for him to repeat the same instruction: but it was safe for them, and suited to their afflicted circumstances. Some think he meant, that it was easy for him, but safe for them, to write the same things to them, which he had written to other churches. (Marg. Ref. a—c.)—He also warned them to "beware of dogs." The Jews contemptuously called the Gentiles dogs; but the bigoted, selfish, Judaizing teachers are supposed to be here intended by that emblem; as they could fawn on those that favoured them; yet were greedy, snarling, and ready to bite or devour such as opposed them. Perhaps apostates from Christianity are meant. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Mic. 3:5—7. Matt. 7:6.) The "evilworkers" may also include those teachers and professors, who perverted the doctrines of grace, and indulged themselves in sin, as a part of their Christian liberty. He also warned his brethren to "beware of the concision," or the cutting off: the Judaizers laid much stress on cutting off the foreskin, though they did not mortify the deeds of the body: they wanted to cut off the Gentiles from the church, but they cut off themselves and others from salvation, by their dependence on the works of the law. (Marg. Ref. e—f.) The honourable title of "the circumcision" did not therefore belong to them. That ancient rite was no longer of any value: Christians were "the true circumcision," the covenant-people of God, the spiritual seed of Abraham: "the righteousness of faith" was sealed to them by the circumcision of the heart, of which baptism was the outward sign. (Notes, Rom. 2:25—29. 4:9—17.) They "worshipped God in the Spirit," not merely according to external forms, but spiritually, with the hearts and under the teaching of the Holy Spirit; (Note, John 4:21—24.) and they "rejoiced," or "gloried," in Jesus Christ the Subject of all the prophecies, and the Substance of all the shadows of the old dispensation; and they "had no confidence in the flesh;" or in any thing which man might possess while unregenerate and an unbeliever. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Note, 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)—The apostle did not thus put himself on a level with the Gentile converts, because he had nothing of a carnal or external nature to depend on: for, if any man supposed himself to have distinctions of this kind in which to glory, he could evince that he had more. He had been circumcised on the eighth day, according to the law and custom he could trace back his genealogy to Israel and Abraham he was of the tribe of Benjamin, which was descended from Rachael the wife of Jacob's choice; and which never apostatized from the worship of God at the temple, as most of the other tribes had done. Both his parents were Hebrews; so that he was neither born nor educated a Hellenist Jew, who might be supposed less exact in the law. As a Pharisee, he had been peculiarly strict both in the Mosaic ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders: his persecution of the church proved his zeal for the Jewish religion; (Note, Gal. 1:11—14.) and his whole conduct was externally so conformable to the letter of the law, that, in respect of that kind of righteousness, no one could lay any thing to his charge. (Marg. Ref. l—t. Notes, Matt. 19:16—22. Rom. 7:9—12.) But all those things, which he once deemed most advantageous to him, and conducive to his acceptance with God, as well as to his reputation and preferment, he at length had learned to "account loss for Christ;" being fully assured, that if he depended on them, or cleaved to them, they would prevent his salvation by the grace of the gospel. He had therefore willingly renounced them all; as the merchant in a storm casts overboard his most valuable property, lest it should occasion the loss of his life. V 8—11. 'The present time is to be noted: ... so that the apostle, as to what relates to justification before God, excludes all works: those which follow, as well as those which precede faith.' Beza.—The apostle not only had judged at his first conversion, that his legal righteousness, and his worldly prospects, were "loss to him," compared with Christ; but after many years spent in successfully preaching the gospel, with apostolical authority, abundant miraculous gifts, immense labours, extraordinary success, multiplied sufferings, and most exemplary holiness; he decidedly "counted all these things to be loss," in comparison of "the most excellent knowledge of Christ" from revelation, by faith, and subsequent experience in the glory of his Person and redemption. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, 1 Chr. 28:9. Is. 53:11,12. Matt. 11:25—27. John 17:1—3, v. 3. 2 Cor. 4: 3—6. 1 John 5:20,21.) For his sake, whom he rejoiced to call "his Lord," he had "suffered the loss of" his worldly friends, prospects, and interests: and his vigour of mind, his superior talents, his learning, and his connexion with the great, had seemed to promise him great prosperity. But he had renounced all, even his country and liberty: and he continually expected, that he should be called to lay down his life in this cause. Yet he accounted all these likewise to be most worthless in comparison of Christ, as the ground of his hope of acceptance with God, and of eternal salvation. He therefore gladly parted with them in order to win "the Pearl of great price," which alone could make him rich, honourable, and happy for ever. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) For his great desire was "to be found in Christ" 'in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment;' as Noah was in the ark, when the deluge swept away an unbelieving world: and to stand before God, not having, as his plea or title to life, "his own righteousness," which, having the law of God as its measure, could only condemn him; but "that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith," even that righteousness, which God imputes to the believing sinner; namely, the perfect obedience unto death of his incarnate Son, which alone can answer the demands of the law, and render a transgressor's salvation consistent with the perfect justice of God. (Marg. Ref. e—i. Notes, Rom. 1: 17. 3:19—26. 8:1,2. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, v. 30. 2 Cor. 5:18—21.) All things else the apostle deemed worthless, compared with his "knowledge of Christ," and that joyful transforming view of his glory, and experience of his grace, which resulted from saving faith: that he might "know the power of his resurrection" more and more, by the new creation of his soul to holiness; that he might have "fellowship with him in his sufferings," both by the mortification of his sinful nature, and by enduring patiently the enmity of the world for his sake "being made conformable to his death;" both by "dying to sin that he might live to God," and by laying down his life when called to it in the service of his beloved Saviour: and that so, by any means, at any rate, by making any sacrifice, or bearing any afflictions, he might attain to that perfect felicity, to which the saints will be admitted at the resurrection, and of which their preceding joys are an anticipation. (Marg. Ref. k—o. Notes, Rom. 6:3—11. Eph. 1:15—23, vv. 19,20. Col. 2:11,12. 3:1—4.) The apostle did not mean that he doubted of this happy event of his labours: (Note, 1:21—26.) but he showed what was the great object which he pursued, and for which he renounced all other hopes and prospects, and endured such complicated trials; and he instructed others in the way of obtaining and possessing an assured hope. (Note, 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)—It is evident, that the apostle speaks, not of the resurrection in general, for this will be both "of the just and of the unjust:" but of "the resurrection to eternal life," in that glorious view of it, which is afterwards given. (Note, 20,21.)—When the sinner believes in Christ, he is immediately "justified by faith, and has peace with God:" yet, he "through the Spirit waits for the hope of righteousness by faith:" for at the day of judgment, when living faith will be distinguished by its fruits from dead faith, the sentence of justification will not only be confirmed, but proclaimed to the whole assembled world. V. 12—14. The apostle did not mention his simple dependence and earnestness of soul, as a proof that he had attained the prize, or "was already perfected" in his Saviour's image. On the contrary, he continued still pursuing; and aiming, by further labours and progress in holiness, to finish his course and obtain the prize, for which he had been graciously arrested by the Lord Jesus, when he was a malignant persecutor. He disregarded all past attainments and services; as the racer in the Isthmian games seemed to forget the ground over which he had run, and the competitors whom he had left behind: and he reached forth to further labours, and increased conformity to Christ, without loitering or weariness; as the racer exerted all his vigour and agility to outstrip those before him, and to pass over the remainder of his course. (Marg. Ref. p—u.) "One thing" engaged his attention, to the exclusion of all interfering considerations: thus he "pressed forward to the mark" with unremitting speed, that he might receive the prize of heavenly glory, which God had called on him, by Jesus Christ, to aspire after: even as the racer urged his course to the goal; keeping the victor's crown full in view, and animated by the acclamations of those, who excited him "so to run that he might obtain." (Marg. Ref. x—b. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Heb. 12:1—3.) When we consider what the apostle had actually attained; (Notes, 8—11. 1:19—26. 4:8—13.) even so much genuine holiness, that very few can endure a comparison of their own attainments with his: and yet consider him as acknowledging that he had not attained, and as "pressing forward" at something far higher: we may form our judgment of every modern pretence to sinless perfection, as well as of our own exceedingly inferior proficiency. V. 15, 16. The apostle next exhorted all those who were "perfect," to be like-minded with him in the things above stated; "counting all but loss for Christ," deeming their present attainments inconsiderable, and "pressing forward to the mark." This exhortation (Note, 12—14.) implies, that the temper and conduct before described form the Christian's highest perfection in this world.—The word here rendered "perfect," may signify the sound character of the established believer; the man, who is matured in judgment and experience, and has made great progress in Christianity. It is used in the Greek authors, especially Xenophon, for men of full age, (about thirty,) as distinguished from boys and young men; and the apostle conveys a similar idea by it in other passages. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, Heb. 5:11—14.)—In this way Christians would best wait for further instruction: and if any were otherwise minded than their brethren, or than the apostle, being under some mistake or misapprehension; by thus avoiding disputation, and diligently practising what they knew, from evangelical principles, they might hope that God would make known to them those things, of which they still remained ignorant; and their stronger brethren ought to bear with their prejudices, till they were in this manner obviated. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Rom. 14:1—4. 15:1—3.) Nevertheless, they all ought to be exceedingly careful, not to decline from that measure of faith, diligence, constancy, and holiness, to which they had attained: but that, by "walking according to the same rule" of divine truth, and "minding the same thing," and using means of improvement in which they had hitherto proceeded, they might keep the ground which they had gained, and make further progress; being especially careful not to grow slack in one part of religion, by becoming zealous in another. (Marg. Ref. f—h.)

V. 17—19. In full confidence that he acted with propriety and exhibited a highly instructive example, in the conduct above described, the apostle called on his children at Philippi to unite together in imitating him; and to observe and copy such Christians as followed his example, and that of Timothy and Silas, in these respects. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) For alas! "many walked" in a very different manner. He had often spoken to them against the contagious principles and examples of some professed Christians; and he now mentioned them, not with acrimony or resentment, but "with tears" of compassion for their souls, and of grief for the dishonour which they brought upon the gospel. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) For, in fact, they were most dangerous "enemies to the cross of Christ." They did not approve, nay they hated, the holy import of that instructive transaction, even the crucifixion of the divine Saviour, which was the grand display of the holiness of God, of the excellency of the law, and of the evil of sin; (Note, Gal. 6:11—14.) and their licentious lives more disgraced the doctrine of the cross, than all the obloquy and opposition of avowed enemies. "The end" of their vain profession, if persisted in, would certainly be final "perdition;" as "their god was their belly," the indulgence of their appetites was the chief good which they proposed to themselves, and the chief satisfaction which they sought: to this base idol they sacrificed the most important interests, and from it they expected their happiness, instead of seeking it from the Lord. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Pet. 2:12—14.) At the same time, they "gloried" in their licentious doctrines, practices, and success in making proselytes and corrupting others; of which they ought to have been "ashamed," and which would certainly terminate in their deep disgrace. For they were "carnally minded," and, not "savouring" heavenly things, they "minded," and primarily regarded, worldly pleasures and interests. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 16:21—23, v. 23. Rom. 8: 5—9. Col. 3:1—4.)—Some expositors explain this, almost exclusively, of the Judaizing teachers and their followers; but others suppose the Gnostics to be especially meant, and doubtless many among each of these were of this stamp. Yet there were others also who perverted the gospel; and the apostle's words at least equally point out licentious Antinomian professors, whether Jews or Gentiles; of which we cannot doubt that many sprang up in every part of the church. Nor is it prudent to represent all the danger to lie on one side, when the opposite extreme is equally fatal.

Be followers together. (17) Συμμιμηται μου γινεσθε. Here only. 'Imitate me among others who imitate me.' Erasmus. Εκ συν, et μιμητης. See on 1 Cor. 4:16.—An ensample.] Τυπον. See on John 20:25. Rom. 6:17.—Earthly things. (19) Τα επιγεια. 2:10. See on John 3:12.

V. 20, 21. In opposition to the base and grovelling characters before described, the apostle here showed, that true Christians are "citizens of heaven," where their hearts and treasures are lodged, and whence their hopes and comforts are derived, so that their judgment, affections, and conduct must be of a heavenly nature. Thence also all true believers expect the coming of Christ "to be their Judge," and are continually preparing to meet him. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) Instead of idolising animal gratifications, they deem the body itself at present to be a "vile body, a body of humiliation," being the seat of ensnaring appetites, the instrument of sins, the encumbrance of the soul in duty, liable to manifold and loathsome diseases, and condemned to return to corruption and dust. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:39—44, vv. 42—44.) But they expect that Christ, at his second coming, will "change" their bodies, fashioning them into a complete conformity to his glorified body, rendering them incorruptible and spiritual, and thus preparing them to participate and improve the holy felicity of the immortal soul, to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. a.) This the Saviour will effect by his own omnipotent operation, according to that "working" by which he is able to subdue all things to himself, and so give them final deliverance from death, their last enemy. (Marg. Ref. b.)—The contrast between "the body of our humiliation," and the "body of his glory," into the likeness of which Jesus will change our bodies, is remarkable. There seems to be a reference to the transfiguration. (Notes, Matt. 17:1—8.)—If omnipotence is an incommunicable divine perfection, the apostle's language doubtless attests his Deity, in the most emphatical language. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. We ought to be "zealous of good works," but to "rejoice in the Lord" alone. (Notes, Is. 12:1—3. 45:23—25. 61:10,11. Hab. 3:17—19.)—Repetitions on such important subjects, though easy to the teacher, are safe to the hearers, and must not be deemed superfluous: being often far more useful than the most original, ingenious, admired, or learned disquisitions.—We cannot too earnestly guard men against those, who either oppose or pervert the doctrine of salvation by mercy and grace alone. Many of these are greedy of their own interest, fierce against their opposers, and ready to rend in pieces the church, in order to propagate

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle affectionately exhorts and encourages the Christians at Philippi to steadfastness in the faith, concord among themselves, and joy in the Lord, 1—4; and to moderation, confidence in God, constant prayer and thanksgiving, and universal good behaviour, 5—9. He declares his joy in the Lord, on account of their renewed care of him, in sending by Epaphroditus a supply for his wants, 10; for, though he had learned, and was able through Christ strengthening him, to be content in any station; they had done well in communicating with him in his affliction, 11—14. Indeed, they alone had formerly thus communicated with him; and he rejoiced that they were thus fruitful; as it would redound to their own profit; being a spiritual sacrifice peculiarly acceptable to God through Christ, who would abundantly supply all their wants, 15—19. To him he ascribes eternal glory, 20; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 21—23.

[a]THEREFORE, my brethren, dearly beloved [b]and longed for, [c]my joy and crown, [d]so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

2 I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche, [e]that they be of the same mind in the Lord.

3 And [f]I entreat thee also, [g]true yokefellow, [h]help those women which laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-labourers, [i]whose names are in the book of life.

their own peculiar notions or observances; though some are more plausible.—But we should also protest against "evil workers" of every description, with decision and impartiality. The true Christian will be aware of them; he "worships God in the Spirit, glories in Christ Jesus," has "the circumcision of the heart," and confides in nothing of which unregenerate men are capable. (Notes, Jer. 9:23,24. Col. 2:10—12. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)—But, how far short do many, who "have confidence in the flesh," come of the attainments of Saul the persecutor! Their birth of Christian parents, early baptism, and "form of godliness," can scarcely be imagined superior to his distinctions of a similar nature; but where is their strictness, their zeal, their morality, and their blameless conduct? Yet they trust in their poor scanty worthless forms and duties; and count them too valuable to be exchanged for Christ and his salvation! But if they ever "come to themselves," and become acquainted with God, his law, and their own characters; they will "count all their gain" to be "loss for Christ:" and if, in consequence of their conversion, they should lose all outward things, and endure all kinds of persecutions in the Lord's service; if they should labour more abundantly, and walk more holily, than their brethren; they will still "count even all these things but loss and dung, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ;" they will renounce all dependence on their best services, and esteem all worldly objects worthless, compared with the hope of "gaining Christ and being found in him." They will deprecate, as sure destruction, having their eternal state in any measure decided according to their own righteousness: they will desire above all things to have "that righteousness which is through the faith of Christ, even the righteousness which is of God by faith." They will see, that no additions need be made to his "unsearchable riches," no security added to his sure refuge, no appendages to his robe of righteousness. Thus they will account themselves rich, safe, and happy, in proportion to their assurance of being "found in Christ," and "made the righteousness of God in him:" but, in seeking for this assurance, as well as in order to glorify so bounteous and beloved a Friend; they will also earnestly desire, and aim at, a more transforming "knowledge of Christ," a deeper experience of the power of his resurrection, and a nearer conformity to him in his sufferings and death, by dying to sin, and crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts. And, at the same time, the love of Christ will constrain them, if called to it, to suffer, yea to die with him, that they may be also glorified together: if so be, they may, by any means, be partakers of the resurrection to eternal felicity in heaven.

V. 12—21. Thousands and ten thousands, yea millions, have testified, that the above is the judgment and experience of true Christians: nor can any measure of personal holiness or self-denying labours satisfy the man, who "counts all but loss that he may win Christ," and be justified by faith in him alone. He still "counts not himself to have attained;" he is continually humbled for his manifold defects and defilements; he still "follows after," in hope of attaining to that prize, for which he was apprehended, when a careless, ignorant sinner, a wretched sensualist, or a proud formalist, by the Saviour's preventing grace. In his Christian course "he forgets the things which are behind, and reaches forth to those things which are before;" and presses forward to "the mark, for the prize of his high calling in Christ Jesus." In these respects there are indeed very great disparities among real Christians; but all know something of these purposes, desires, and experiences. Those who are most "perfected and matured" in the life of faith and grace, still need exhortations to be thus minded: they who are newly set out, should be called on to emulate such honourable examples: and while they judge and act in this manner, as to these grand concerns, the Lord will guide them into the further knowledge of his truth and will. For satisfactory views of divine things are far better acquired by peaceable meditation and diligent obedience, than by eager and angry disputations. (Notes, John 7:14—17. 8:30—36.) We should, however, be very careful not to grow remiss and languid, in those things "to which we have already attained:" but still continue to "walk by the same rule, and mind the same things," that we may make a perpetual progress in the divine life, and secure, as it were, every post of which we have got possession. Let us then assiduously endeavour to walk after the example of apostles and evangelists, that our conduct may be meet for others to copy with advantage: (Note, 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) for alas! in every age, there are professors of the gospel, of whom the humble, zealous Christian can scarcely think or speak, without sorrow and weeping. Of these, ministers must warn and caution their flocks in tender love: seeing "their end is destruction;" sensual indulgence is their filthy deity; they glory in their shameful abuse of the gospel, and "mind earthly things" under a religious profession. But let us, as citizens of heaven, "have our conversation" of a contrary nature: may we continually prepare for the coming of our Judge, "that we may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless:" may we expect confidently to have our bodies of humiliation changed by his almighty power, into the fashion of his glorified body: and, in this prospect, may we apply to him daily to new-create our souls unto holiness; to deliver us from our enemies, "to bruise Satan under our feet," and to employ both our bodies and souls as "instruments of righteousness" in his service on earth, till he shall come to receive us to his heavenly kingdom!

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1. This verse evidently relates to the subject with which the former chapter concluded. (Notes, 3:20,21. 1 Cor. 15:55—58.) Seeing the Philippians had such hopes, and so powerful and gracious a Friend, let them stand fast in faith and obedience, amidst all enemies and temptations; as they had hitherto done, and as had been recommended to them. (Marg. Ref. Note, 1 Cor. 16:13,14. 1 Thes. 3:6—10.) The verse is principally remarkable for the variety of expressions, in which the apostle poured out the affection of his heart towards his brethren, or rather children, at Philippi. They were indeed "dearly beloved," with them he longed to commune; (Note, 1:7,8.) and he earnestly desired to be still more useful to them. He counted them "his joy and crown" amidst all his sorrow and disgrace; and he expected that they would be so in the day of Christ. (Note, 1:27—30. 1 Thes. 2:17—20.)

V. 2, 3. It is probable, that Euodias and Syntyche were women of note at Philippi, who on some account had disagreed; this both impeded their usefulness, and tended to cause divisions in the church. The apostle therefore entreated them to accommodate their differences, by mutual concessions and forgivenesses; so that they might be "of one mind in the Lord," for his sake, and in seeking the peace and welfare of his church. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Matt. 5:23, 34. 18:15—17. 1 Cor. 6:1—6. Eph. 4:30—32. Col. 3:12—15.) The "true yokefellow," or genuine associate in the work of Christ, whom the apostle addressed without naming, was doubtless well known at Philippi; though our conjectures respecting him must be precarious. Some think that the person intended was husband to one of the women abovementioned; others that he was some eminent minister at Philippi. The apostle, however, entreated him to use his influence, in bringing those women to a cordial agreement, and in helping them to accomplish all their good designs, for the honour of Christ and the promulgation of the gospel: for they had formerly laboured, by their private endeavours, to promote the success of his public ministry; as Clement (or Clemens) also had done, and several others, whom he acknowledged as his fellow-labourers; and whose zeal and love emboldened him to say, that their names were enrolled in the book of life, among the elect of God and the heirs of heaven. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Is. 4:3,4. Dan. 12:1. Luke 10:17—20. Rev. 3:4—6. 13:8—10. 17:7,8. 20:11—15.) It is not certain that this was Clemens Romanus, an epistle of whose writing is yet extant: but it is generally supposed that the apostle meant him.

V. 4. (Notes, 2:14—18. 3:1—7, vv. 1—3.) The apostle again exhorts the Philippians to "rejoice in the Lord alway," even in the midst of persecutions, afflictions, and temptations; though they should be poor, bereaved, sick, imprisoned, or in danger of death; yea, notwithstanding their manifold sins, and their present lamented imperfections and defilements, the deplorable evils which they might witness among professed Christians, and the wretched state of the ruined world around them. For the favour, mercy, salvation, protection, and consolation of their all-sufficient and almighty Lord; the honour of their relation to him, the felicity of communion with him, and the eternal glory which he had prepared for them as his ransomed flock, comprised a joy, which might more than counterbalance all the causes of their sorrows; and which would satisfy and sanctify their hearts, and fortify them for self-denial, suffering, and death. Nor were they to consider this exhortation as given without due consideration of their inward and outward impediments. Lest they should suppose this to be the case, he would again call upon them to "rejoice;" for he knew, that if they lived up to their privileges, and walked worthy of their high calling, they could never want cause for joy, and would generally be enabled to rejoice. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ps. 32:8—11. 33:1 34:1,2. Rom. 5:1—5. 12:9—13. 1 Thes. 5:16—22. Jam. 1:2—4. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.)—The Lord Jesus, or "God in Christ," "God become our Salvation," is especially meant, in all these animating calls to rejoice.

V. 5—7. In connexion with the holy joy above inculcated, and in order to it, the apostle exhorted his beloved brethren, to manifest an indifference concerning those worldly possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments, about which men in general contend and quarrel: that so, the "meekness" of their disposition might be known to all men, even to their enemies; who would perceive how "moderate" they were, as to the acquisition and use of outward things: and how composedly they suffered the loss or want of them, or any of those hardships, to which the injustice of their persecutors exposed them. (Note, Heb. 10:32—34.) This they should aim at, under a realizing assurance that "the Lord was at hand." The present life, with all its trials or enjoyments, was speedily vanishing; the Lord would soon come to receive the souls of his people to glory, and to terminate the prosperity of his enemies; nay, the day of final retribution would speedily arrive, with complete redemption to believers, and "perdition to ungodly men." (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 1 Cor. 7:29—31. Jam. 5:7—11. 1 Pet. 4:7.) Whatever then was taken from them, or wanting to them; whatever discouraged or distressed them, in their own concerns, or those of their brethren; they ought to watch against unbelieving anxiety, and a useless solicitude about events. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Matt. 6:25. Luke 12:22—34.) In order to this, they ought, in every case, when any thing either relating to their spiritual or temporal concerns, to their families, or to the church, of whatever nature or magnitude, rendered them solicitous; "by prayer and supplication," for themselves and others, to "make their requests known unto God;" pouring out their hearts before him, and joining their fervent prayers with "thanksgiving" for mercies already received. (Marg. Ref. q, s.) In thus seeking to God, under a consciousness of their indigence, dependence, and unworthiness, and in believing reliance on his mercy, power, truth, and grace, they would find, that "the peace" which he alone could bestow, consisting of an inward, thankful, admiring sense of his forgiving love, an acquiescence in his will, a confidence in him for help, and a serene composure of the soul, would be vouchsafed to them. This peace indeed could not be understood by those who did not experience it, nor could any words give them an adequate idea of it; nay, even true believers could not fully explain its nature and excellency: but they would find their affections, and all the power of their souls, possessed and garrisoned by it, to the exclusion of alluring, alarming, and harassing temptations, through the merits of Christ, the supply of his Spirit, and the exercise of faith in him. (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, Ps. 25:14. John 14:27,28. Rom. 15:8—13. Gal. 5:22—26 Col. 3:12—15. Rev. 2:17.)—This peace is "my peace," says Jesus; it is the "fruit of the Spirit:" it is "the peace of God."—Moderation. (5) 'It means meekness under provocation, readiness to forgive injuries, equity in the management of business, candour in judging characters and actions, ... sweetness of disposition, and the entire government of the passions.' Macknight. 'Equity; a mind moderate as to the things of this life, and by no means strictly exacting what is justly due.' Beza.—"The Lord is at hand," (5) or near. Some understand the clause of his being a present Help in trouble. Others suppose the apostle meant, that the Lord would speedily come to destroy Jerusalem, and deprive the Jews of that power and influence, by which they became the general instigators of persecution. Probably this interpretation was adopted, lest it should be inferred, that the apostle erroneously supposed the day of judgment to be near at hand; but it is by no means satisfactory. It is, however, the manner of the sacred writers, to consider all temporal things as short, and the end of them as "at hand," and "the Judge as at the door:" and, seeing death is the same, in a great measure, to individuals, as judgment will be to the world at large; their language is in this respect highly suitable and proper.—With thanksgiving. (6) 'Thus David, very often beginning with lamentations and tears, concludes with thanksgiving.' Beza.—The mind and heart are distinguished. "The peace of God," and the happy experience of it, fortifies and garrisons the intellectual faculties, against the cavils, objections, and vain reasonings of infidels skeptics, philosophers, and heretics; and the affections against the allurements and terrors of worldly objects; and both mind and heart against all the temptations of the devil.

V. 8, 9. The substance of the practical exhortations which the apostle had further to give, might be comprised in a few words. Whatsoever tempers, words, or actions, in any way expressed truth, candour, sincerity, or fidelity; whatsoever appeared grave, "venerable," or respectable; whatsoever was just and upright, stamped with probity and integrity; whatsoever evinced purity, chastity, and temperance; whatsoever was amiable, or friendly; whatsoever was justly of good report, and approved as virtuous or commendable among men; let the Philippians continually "think of these things," form a due estimate of the value of each, adopt such as were really good, and endeavour to manifest them in every part of their conduct. (Marg. Ref. b—k.) In short, let them practise what he had taught them, and what they had received as teachable scholars; what they had heard from him, and witnessed in his example: and then he could confidently assure them of the comforting and protecting presence of their reconciled God, (as the Author of inward and outward peace,) with their souls, and in their assemblies. V. 10—13. The apostle would not conclude his epistle, without a special acknowledgment of the kindness shown him by the Philippians. It had indeed "greatly rejoiced him in the Lord," with reference to his providence, will, and glory; that, after a considerable time, their care of him had flourished again, as a tree shoots forth its buds in the spring. This not only excited him to thank God for putting it into their hearts to supply his urgent necessities; but it made him joyful, as it evinced the prosperous state of their souls. Indeed, he was now satisfied that they had all along been careful for him, and desired to help him; but they had wanted the opportunity or ability of doing it so soon as they had intended; yet perhaps his godly jealousy over them had made him before fear, lest they were become disaffected or remiss. (Marg. Ref. p—r.)—He did not, however, speak this with respect to the want which he had suffered, as if that were an intolerable evil: for "he had learned" in the school of experience, under the tuition of Christ, "to be contented" and well satisfied with the appointments of God, in whatever situation he was placed. He "knew how to be abased" by the deepest poverty, labouring hard for a mean subsistence, neglected and despised; without repining, or using any dishonourable means of obtaining relief: and he was able "to abound," without deviating from the strictest rules of temperance and humility, and without growing reluctant to the most self-denying and afflictive labours. In every respect, and in all things, he was "initiated" into the mysterious life of faith and communion with God, as the Source of consolation: so that he "knew how to be full," and able to impart to others, without being betrayed into inexpedient indulgence, pride, or love of worldly things; or to be hungry, and destitute of bare necessaries for himself, without being discomposed, or unfitted for his place and work. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) Thus he found by experience, that he "could do all things," in this respect, and in whatever was connected with his duty: not by his natural ability, nor yet by the grace which he had already received; but through the strength daily communicated to him from Christ, whose power rested upon him, and enabled him for every service and situation to which he called him. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Eph. 3:14—19. 6:10—13. Col. 1:9—14, v. 11. 1 Tim. 4:6—10, vv. 6—8. Heb. 13:5,6.)—He seems to have learned these things, by a deep sense of his own unworthiness, and his obligations to the Lord; by continually contemplating the poverty, abasement, and sufferings of Christ; by a believing confidence in the wisdom, faithfulness, and love of God, who ordered all this concern in the best manner possible: by a lively hope of immortal felicity; and an ardent desire, by any labours or sufferings, to promote the cause of Christ in the world.—It appears to us wonderful, that the apostle, in so affluent a city as Rome, where a flourishing church of Christ had been for a considerable time established, and even after his imprisonment for the gospel had excited very great attention among large multitudes, should want the necessaries or comforts of life. But the Gentiles, in general, were little in the habit of giving to the poor, or contributing to the support of the ministers of religion: and the apostle, like Elisha in respect of Naaman, would be extremely careful not to excite their prejudices, or interrupt the success of the gospel, by his own concerns: so that, probably, it was not generally known that he was in want. The Christians at Rome, as in other places, were, it may be supposed, chiefly of the lower orders; and they had already to provide for their own pastors, the poor, and the expenses of their religious worship. Yet, after all these considerations have been allowed their full weight; not only the disinterestedness of the apostle, but the inattention, to say no more, of the Christians, cannot but excite our astonishment!—Abased. (12) 'He who is poor, is despised by most men, how much soever he may be adorned with the excellent gifts of God.' Beza. (Note, Ec. 9:13—18.)—I am instructed.] A reference is made to the initiation of select persons into certain concealed mysteries, among the heathen. There is reason to believe, that these celebrated mysteries contained much evil, and little or no good: but the mystery of the life of faith, submission to God and reliance on him, was of a higher and nobler nature.

V. 14—20. Though the apostle could well have endured his poverty without murmuring; he was not on that account, by any means, the less entitled to assistance: and the Philippians had done a good work in communicating with him in his affliction, or partaking of it, by straitening themselves to relieve him. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, 1:3—6.) This renewed instance of their liberal affection made it proper for him to mention, what they indeed knew, that at "the beginning of the gospel" being preached among them, when he "departed from Macedonia, no church," except that at Philippi, had maintained Christian fellowship with him, by giving him a supply for his urgent wants, and by his receiving it from them. Even when he was successfully preaching at Thessalonica, and labouring with his own hands for a maintenance, they had repeatedly sent him supplies. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) This demanded his grateful remembrance: not "because he desired a gift" for its own sake, or coveted the property of his hearers; but because he desired to see them fruitful in those good works, which would conduce to their present comfort, and future felicity: whereas, no doubt, it grieved him to see professed Christians tenacious of their worldly goods, and leaving their ministers to struggle with deep poverty. But, in every respect, he had all that he could wish for; he was fully satisfied with their conduct, and with his own circumstances, "having received from Epaphroditus" the supply which they had sent. This he knew to be far more acceptable to God, than the most fragrant incense, being "a spiritual sacrifice," "well pleasing to him," as the genuine fruit of faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to him. (Marg. Ref. g—n.) The apostle indeed could not make them the return which he wished; but "his God and Father," "whose he was, and whom he served," would surely "supply all their wants" of every kind, according to the riches of his all-sufficiency and bounty; especially by bringing them to his eternal glory through Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref. o—r. Note, 2 Cor. 9:8—11.) To him, therefore, as the common Father of the whole family, he ascribed the glory of all which was done in them, for them, and by them; and of all his manifested perfections, and wonderful works, which the apostle fervently desired might be universally adored for ever and ever (Marg. Ref. s.)—Nothing could more fully show the peculiar confidence which the apostle had, concerning the Christians at Philippi, (as well as the fervour of his prayer for them,) than this conduct in receiving support from them, and so long after thus acknowledging it. Thessalonica was indeed a larger city than Philippi, but probably the converts to Christianity were poorer; and perhaps they had not been so fully proved, when he was driven from them as the Philippians had been. (Note, 2 Cor. 8:1—5.)—As Thessalonica was the chief city of Macedonia, at which St. Paul continued some time, it has been supposed that the clause, "when I departed from Macedonia," relates to a supply sent to him, after he was gone into Achaia, distinct from what had been sent him in Thessalonica.—The language used concerning the conduct of the Philippians, being in the most emphatical terms the same which is used concerning the atonement of Christ, (Eph. 5:2.) is wonderful: and it shows how pleasing real good works, "the fruits of the Spirit," are to God through Jesus Christ. V. 21, 22. "The brethren" may here either mean the ministers at Rome, or such of the apostle's friends as were come from other parts to be with him.—There were true "saints in Nero's household;" who kept their places, and served Christ in that most perilous and ensnaring situation, as Daniel did in the court of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius. (Dan. 4:—6:)—It is probable, that they were generally in inferior stations. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. Affectionate ministers, like tender parents, can scarcely find words emphatical enough to express their love, and their fervent desires after the felicity of those, whom they regard as their present "joy," and their future "crown." They greatly long after their steadfastness in the faith, and constant devotedness to God, amidst the temptations and allurements of the world: and their good conduct for a season makes them the more earnest with them, to acquit themselves honourably for the future. They so love the blessed office of peacemakers, that they will even supplicate, by name, their own children, to "be of one mind in the Lord:" and they so much desire the success of every good work, that they use all their influence to excite every one "to help all those, who labour" in any way to promote the gospel, and thus give assurance that "their names are written in the book of life." This affectionate spirit should be cultivated, and sought in constant prayer, by all ministers, as peculiarly conducive to usefulness.—Believers have always ground of "rejoicing in the Lord," though they are not always able to rejoice: the perfection of their duty, and the full enjoyment of their privilege, are precisely the same: their disconsolations arise from weakness of faith and grace, and they should be called upon to "rejoice in the Lord alway," though they be not able to come up to the standard; that they may aim high: for the nearer they come to it, the more will God be glorified in and by them. Living upon these holy, satisfying, and substantial joys, we should make it appear that we are not of this world. Let the carnal, the ambitious, and the selfish grasp at the possessions, enjoyments, and parade of a day, and contend about them as children about their toys; our "moderation" about temporal things, and our composure amidst injuries and losses, should be manifest to all men. "The Lord is at hand;" the hour of death, and the day of judgment, will speedily arrive. The transient joys and sorrows of the present scene are not worth our solicitude; all our temporal and eternal interests are in the Lord's hands; we should therefore be "careful for nothing," except to know the state of our souls, and the path of duty. In all our sorrows, fears, wants, or trials, we should "make our requests known unto God;" for, though he knows them beforehand, he loves to hear them from us. (Note, Matt. 6:7, 8.) Whatever our difficulties may be, we have always cause to unite grateful praises with our prayers and supplications; and in this way we shall find an inward satisfaction, and experience that "peace of God which passeth all understanding;" so that our hearts and minds will be preserved in serenity, whatever storms may rage around us.—All our privileges and salvation originate wholly from the free mercy of God: yet the actual enjoyment of them is intimately connected with our holy conversation. Therefore, "whatsoever things are true," venerable, just, pure, loving, "lovely, or of good report;" whatsoever is virtuous and commendable; whatsoever prophets, apostles, or martyrs have exemplified; whatsoever excellency we have heard and read of, or witnessed, in the conduct of the saints; nay, whatever things the world, on good grounds, regards and approves as virtuous and commendable: these things we should continually think of, and diligently practise; and in this way we may confidently expect, and shall doubtless experience, the presence and blessing of the God of peace and love, in every circumstance of life and death.

V. 10—23. Even those who on the whole prosper in religion, have their winters, as well as their spring-seasons: sometimes their zeal and love seem to languish, and then again at last they "flourish" more abundantly. Yet they often "lack opportunity," when they perhaps are judged inattentive: and faithful ministers may sometimes suspect or mourn over them, when if they knew all, they might be rejoicing greatly in the Lord for them. We should, however, confide in God alone; for human friendships are precarious.—It is a great and exceedingly rare and difficult attainment to "learn in whatever state we are, therewith to be content." Pride, unbelief, a vain hankering after something unpossessed, a fickle sickly disrelish of present comforts, and the tedious repetition of the same actions and scenes which no longer give pleasure, render men naturally discontented in the most favourable circumstances: and their continual shiftings from one thing to another resemble the tossing to and fro of a man in a fever, who imputes his restlessness to his posture, rather than to his disease. The discontented spirit, then, is the effect of inward disease, not of outward circumstances: and content must spring from inward health of soul, even from holiness. It requires much humility, spirituality, faith, and resignation, to render us contented in our appointed situations. Probably, few Christians, who even enjoyed liberty and plenty, can sincerely and unreservedly adopt the language of Paul the indigent prisoner of Jesus Christ. We ought, however, to study this important lesson: we should pray continually for patient submission and hope, when we are abased; for humility and a heavenly mind when exalted; and to be initiated into the practical mystery of temperate, self-denying, liberal, lowly abundance, or that of cheerful, contented, and honourable indigence, even if called to suffer hunger and extreme want. We can indeed of ourselves "do nothing;" but we may do all things through Christ, who inwardly strengthens his people, in proportion as they simply depend upon him. He can teach and enable his ministers to live in poverty among the affluent, without grudging, envying, coveting, or repining; even when they have an equitable claim upon them for a portion of their abundance. Indeed, we should peculiarly aim at this, if we would be examples to the flock, and convince the wealthy that we "seek not theirs but them."—Notwithstanding this, the people should be taught, that "they do well in communicating to the wants" of their faithful pastors; who are justly entitled to liberal assistance, in proportion as they are willing to "endure all things, rather than hinder the gospel of Christ." (Note, 1 Cor. 9:7—23.) And those who distinguish themselves in such services, from pure motives, shall be "had in everlasting remembrance;" for their most secret good works shall be published at the last day, if not before.—The affectionate servant of Christ will not "desire a gift:" nay, on some occasions he will firmly refuse it, whatever his straits may be: yet, he cannot but long to see his people fruitful in such things, as will "abound to their own account:" and though he be willing to suffer want; yet he must grieve, when they neglect their bounden duty, and bring their state into question, or prevent their own comfort.—Pride, rather than disinterestedness, sometimes induces men, when in actual straits, to refuse or decline such help, as is offered them in the most unexceptionable manner: but still more evidently, it is this evil principle, which makes them unwilling to acknowledge the favours which they have received.—We should not then be reluctant, on proper occasions, to acknowledge our obligations to those who have ministered to our necessities; and to commend their fruits of faith and love, as "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice, acceptable, well-pleasing unto God." What we cannot repay, we may trust that he will, "according to his riches in Christ Jesus," supplying all the wants of those who thus straiten themselves, and bringing them to his heavenly kingdom; that glory may be to him, our God and Father, for evermore.—Whether saints reside in palaces, cottages, or dungeons, communion should be maintained among them, by mutual prayers, salutations, and kindnesses The Lord will have some to honour him in every situation; and he can preserve them unhurt in their proper places, however perilous, by the power which protected the three young men in the fiery furnace: (Notes, Dan. 3:) for "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ" will be with all his true people, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished, and prove eventually "sufficient for them."

COLOSSIANS.

COLOSSÆ was a populous city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, near to Laodicea and Hierapolis.—It is not recorded, that St. Paul had been there; and the general testimony of antiquity favours the opinion, that Epaphras, or some other evangelist sent by the apostle from Ephesus, founded the church at Colossè. This sentiment, however, has of late been much controverted. It does not indeed appear to be a matter of much consequence to us; and I am not disposed to enter on so uninteresting a controversy, yet, I must give my decided opinion, that the evidence against the apostle's having been at Colossè is far stronger than any which has been adduced on the affirmative side of the question. There is a great similarity between this epistle, and that to the Ephesians; and it is generally supposed, that they were written about the same time, and sent by the same messenger, even Tychicus, though Onesimus, being a Colossian, who accompanied Tychicus, is not mentioned in the epistle to the Ephesians. (Note, 4 7—14, v 9.)—It is probable, that the apostle had heard of some teachers, who, grafting heathen philosophy along with the tradition of the Pharisees on the ritual law of Moses, had corrupted the gospel by this heterogeneous mixture; and were attempting to draw aside the Colossians. He therefore particularly warned them against these deceivers, and against all who, either by superstitious observances, or philosophy, attempted to seduce them from "the simplicity of Christ;" in whom alone, "they were complete," and had every thing which they could possibly want, or imagine, as really conducive to their edification and salvation. These cautions and exhortations are introduced, and connected with the most exalted views of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ, and the fulness and freeness of his salvation; which many suppose to have been directed against some of those heretical sects, which sprang up at an early period in the church; the leaders of which sought to exalt themselves, by derogating from the glory of the divine Saviour.—It appears, however, that the church at Colossè was, on the whole, in a very flourishing state: and accordingly the epistle abounds far more in thanksgivings to God, commendations, and animating exhortations, than in reproofs and warnings.—Epaphras was, probably, when the apostle wrote, confined as a prisoner at Rome. (Philem. 23.)

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes the saints at Colossè, 1, 2; thanks God for the good account, which he had heard from Epaphras, of their faith and love, 3—8; shows, how he prayed for their increasing knowledge, holiness, patience, joy, and gratitude for redeeming love. 9—14; declares in exalted terms the personal and mediatorial glory of Christ, 15—20; by whom, they, who were once enemies, were now reconciled to God; and would be eternally saved, if they continued in the faith of the gospel, of which Paul was made a minister, 21—23; who rejoiced in all his labours and sufferings for their sakes, as the apostle of the Gentiles, 24—27; and laboured earnestly, "according to the mighty power of God in him," 28, 29.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:1—3.) 'Coloss was situated in Phrygia, not far from Hierapolis and Laodicea; in that part which borders on Lycia and Pamphylia.' Beza.—'I cannot think they are called holy and faithful brethren, on account of their adhering to the purity of the Christian faith, in opposition to those that urged the necessity of observing the Jewish law. This was indeed one instance of their fidelity; but I think it greatly impoverishes and debases the sense of such an extensive phrase, to reduce it within such narrow bounds. Many scores of criticisms of some modern commentators of reputation are liable to the same exception.' Doddridge.—The author quotes this passage, as exactly conveying his own opinion on several learned expositions, both before and since the time of the pious Doddridge. V. 3—8. The apostle began the epistle as usual, by assuring the Colossians, that he "gave thanks to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus," for his grace bestowed on them; and prayed for the perfection of that good work in them. This he and Timothy had done, ever since "they heard of their faith and love;" (Note, Eph. 1:15—23.) blessing God, who had called them from the delusive pursuit of earthly things, to hope for happiness in himself. (Marg. Ref. e—i. Notes, 21—27. 3:1—4. Rom. 5:3—5. 15:8—13. 2 Thes. 2: 16,17. Heb. 6:16—20. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 1 John 3:1—3.) The object of this "hope was laid up in heaven," the place of perfect purity and joy, out of the reach of the vicissitudes of this lower world. It was treasured up "for them," and no enemy could deprive them of it. They had heard of it, "in the word of the truth of the gospel," even the glad tidings of salvation which had been sent to them. It was intended, that this gospel should be published throughout the world; it had made a very rapid progress among the nations (Marg. Ref. k—m.) and, having been attended by divine power, had brought forth fruit in every place, in the conversion of multitudes to the holy service and spiritual worship of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. The same blessed fruits had been produced in the hearts and lives of the Colossians, "since the day when" they first had heard the gospel, and had truly and experimentally believed it, and been really made partakers of Christ and his salvation. (Marg. Ref. m—o.) These things they had learned from Epaphras, whom the apostle owned as a "dear fellow-servant" in the work of Christ; and "a faithful minister," appointed especially to labour for the good of the Colossians, as their stated pastor. Moreover, he had assured the apostle of their love to Christ, and to him for Christ's sake, which they exercised "in the Spirit," under his influences, and in a spiritual manner: and this made him so confident in respect of their interest in the heavenly "hope" before mentioned. (Marg. Ref. p—s.)—We give thanks, &c. (3) 'From this, ... note, that the good shepherd should not only feed his flock, but pray continually for them, and give thanks for the spiritual blessings conferred on them.' Whitby—"To God and the Father."] 'As "God, who is the God of Israel" was the characteristic of the true God to the Jewish nation; so "God, who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," is the characteristic of the same God to Christians: who worship him under that title, as being "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and in him, our Father; we being the sons of God through faith in him; and deriving all our blessings from the Father through him.' Whitby.—"Love in the Spirit." (8) 'Wrought in you by that Spirit, whose fruit is love.' Whitby. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:1—7. Gal. 5:22—26 1 Pet. 1:22.)

V. 9—14. Since the time when the apostle had heard concerning the Christians at Colossè, that they evidently showed their faith in Christ and faithfulness to him, by their "love to all the saints," (2) he and his fellow-labourers "had not ceased to pray for them." He especially requested that they might "be filled," or completely endued, "with the knowledge of the will" of God, both in respect of his method of saving sinners, and of their duties to him and to all men, as his redeemed servants: that they might understand the import and spiritual extent of his commandments; and how to obey them, in the several relations, situations, and offices, which they sustained in the church, and in the community, and by the improvement of their different talents: that they might know how to apply general rules to their own particular cases; and so do the work of Christ assigned to each of them, in the best manner, from the purest motives, and with the happiest effect. (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, Ps. 119:26—34,66,133.) Thus they would proceed "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;" with sagacity and prudent discernment of seasons and opportunities; distinguishing between real excellency, and all deceitful appearances; wisely attending to their duties in the most inoffensive and engaging manner; without affording their enemies any advantage, or losing opportunities of usefulness out of timidity, or failing of success through want of caution and discretion. (Marg. Ref. z. Notes, 3:16,17. 4:5,6. Matt. 10:16—18, v. 16. Luke 21:12—19, v. 15. Rom. 16:17—20. Eph. 5:15—20, vv. 15—18. Jam. 1:5—8. 3:13—18.) He was desirous of this especially, that they might habitually behave in a manner "worthy of" that glorious and holy Lord, whose servants and worshippers they were: not dishonouring him and his cause by any inconsistency or impropriety of conduct; but acting as it became persons so highly favoured and divinely instructed: and that their conduct might in all respects be "well pleasing" to him: while "fruitfulness" in every good work, was connected with a still further "increase in the knowledge of God," and of the glory and harmony of his perfections, and a happy experience of his consolations. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:9—11,27—30. 1 Thes. 2:9—12.)—He likewise "prayed," that the Colossians might be most abundantly "strengthened" in all the graces of the new nature, with an energy suited to their utmost need; according to "the glorious power" of God, by which he converted, upheld, and comforted believers, "to the praise of his glory:" that so they might be enabled to bear all tribulations and persecutions with patient submission, persevering constancy, meekness of long-suffering, and joy in the Lord: while, amidst all trials, they "gave thanks to the Father of our Lord Jesus," whose special grace had "made them meet to be partakers of the inheritance" provided for the saints, in the world of perfect light, knowledge, holiness, and happiness; at a distance from all ignorance, error, sin, temptation, fear, and sorrow. (Marg. Ref. e—i.)—As believers, they were even then called "to walk in the light;" and, compared with the condition of unconverted men, their situation might well be thus distinguished: yet, when the state of glory was spoken of, into which the spirits of the departed brethren had entered, they were still in comparative darkness. (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:8—14. 1 Thes. 5:4—11. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.) They had, however, obtained a portion in that inheritance; and their holy desires, spiritual affections, and capacity for delighting in the work and worship of God; especially their love to the Lord Jesus Christ, and his glorious salvation, constituted "a meetness for that inheritance," and all its joys and employments, and a sure evidence that God intended to bring them to it. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, Rev. 5:8—14. 7:13—17.) For, in order to effect this change in them, he had "rescued them from the power of darkness," the empire of Satan, the prince of darkness, of ignorance, delusion, vice, enmity, and misery, whose blind and abject slaves they had formerly been; and he had translated them into the kingdom of righteousness, of liberty, of light and holiness, of love and felicity, which he had constituted under "his dear Son," or the "Son of his love;" (Notes, Matt. 3:2,16,17.) by faith in whom they enjoyed this redemption, as the purchase of his atoning blood: and thus forgiveness of sins, and all other spiritual blessings, were vouchsafed to them. (Marg. Ref. o—t. Notes, Acts 26:16—18. Eph. 1:3—12. Tit. 2:14.)—The apostle joined himself and the Jewish converts along with the Gentiles in these things: and doubtless all are the subjects of the prince of darkness, of whatever nominal religion they are, till inward conversion translates them into the kingdom of Christ. (Notes, Matt. 12:43—45. John 8:41—47. Eph, 2:1—3. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 John 5:19. Rev. 12:7—12.) And to interpret it of the deliverance of the Gentile converts from idolatry, and of the happy state of the Jewish converts, as "the saints in light," is totally to enervate this highly animated passage.—The "glorious power," here spoken of, is sometimes ascribed to the Father, or to God absolutely; sometimes to the Holy Spirit, and frequently to Christ. For "these Three are One." (Notes, Ps. 138:3. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Eph. 3:14—19, v. 16. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13.)

V. 15—17. Having mentioned Christ, as the "dear Son" of God, or "the Son of his love," (13) the apostle here explained more fully the import of that expression. He declared him to be "the Image of the Invisible God." (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3—6. Heb. 1:1—4.) Being possessed of all divine perfections, as "One with the Father;" he appeared on earth, displaying those perfections, and performing all divine operations, through the medium of the human nature. Thus, he made the invisible God known to mankind, as his "express Image:" he represented the Father, and manifested his glory. In and through him, as "God manifest in the flesh," sinners, believing "the sure testimony of God," might know, approach, trust, and worship him with acceptance; which otherwise they could not have done.—It seems evident that Christ is not called "the Image of God," in respect of his divine nature, as many, especially the ancient expositors, supposed; and so by their illustrations, weakened or perplexed the argument for his real Deity: for the divine essence is no more visible in the Person of the Son, than in that of the Father; and therefore the One cannot be "the Image," or visible representation, of the other. (Note, 1 Tim. 6:13—16.) But the Person of Christ, as God in human nature, is the visible, or sensible, discovery of the invisible God; and "he that hath seen him hath seen the Father." (Notes, Joh 1 2:44—50. 14:

7—14, v. 9. 15:22—25.)—The apostle further declared Christ to be "the First-born of the whole creation;" for so the words may be literally rendered. Christ is called the "First-begotten," or "Only begotten," of the Father; and it has been shown, that these expressions must be understood of the mysterious union in the sacred Trinity, and the relation of the second Person to the first in the divine subsistence; for the grand display of the love of God to the world, consisted in "giving his own Son" to become man, in order to die for our sins; rather than in giving him, when incarnate, to death for us. The expression here used seems to be of the same import: he was qualified to be "the Image of the invisible God" to men, by reason of his original and essential glory. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, John 1:14,18. 1 John 4:9—12.) Existing, as the co-eternal Son of the Father, before the creation of the world; he appeared as the "First-begotten Son of God," to be "the Heir of all things," when they were called into existence, as the first-born is the heir of the estate or kingdom. The reason, or proof, adduced by the apostle, demonstrates, that he meant the words in this sense; "for," says he, "by him all things were created." He then proceeds to mention all creatures in heaven and earth: and by the terms of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers," clearly including the highest created dignity and exaltation, he evidently intended to declare, in the most emphatical terms, that every creature of God, however distinguished, was created by Christ, as one in Deity and operation with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Nay, he added, that they were all "created for him," for the display of his glory, and to do him service: (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Prov. 8:22—33. 16:4. Is. 42:8,9. 44:24. John 1:1—3.) that "he was before all things;" yea, that "all things by him consist," or are preserved in being and order; so that without his sustaining power, they must fall into confusion, or nonexistence. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Note, Rom. 11:33—36.)—It is perhaps impossible to use stronger language, to express creating and upholding Power, universal Sovereignty, and real Deity, than is here employed, to which the Socinians can only say that it is all figurative, and means no more than the introduction of the gospel-dispensation, as a kind of new creation: but nothing can be more absurd. Or they may say, that the apostle was mistaken: and to such obstinate infidelity we oppose the demonstrative evidences of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. In fact, we find language in some respects similar almost in every part of the New Testament.—It should also be observed, that, however we may interpret the expression, "The First-born of every creature," no man can infer from it, that Christ is a sort of supra-angelic creature, (according to the inconsistent opinion of the Arians,) without expressly opposing St. Paul's inference from his own doctrine, or rather the argument by which he confirms it; in which he evidently shows, that he meant Christ was before, above, and distinct from all creatures; yea, the Author, Proprietor, and Supporter of all ranks and orders of them in the universe.

V. 18—20. The same glorious Person, of whose original majesty such sublime language had been employed, was next declared to be "the Head of the body, the church." This manifestly related to his mediatorial character, which he voluntarily assumed, and sustained in human nature. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, 2:10,18,19. 1 Cor. 12:15—31. Eph. 1:15—23. 4:14—16.) He is also, "the Beginning," the Author and Source of spiritual and eternal life to man, "the Resurrection and the Life," both of body and soul: and "the First-born from the dead;" the first who rose to die no more; the First-fruits of his people, who rose to inherit the mediatorial throne, as their Surety and for their benefit. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Notes, John 11:20—27 vv. 25,26. 14:4—6, v. 6. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Rev. 3:14—16.) So that it was evidently intended, that "in all things he should have the pre-eminence," over all worlds, and in all respects; as to creation, providence, redemption, essential dignity, universal sovereignty, assumed and delegated authority, personal excellency, and the display of Omnipotence; as the Conqueror of "death, and of him that had the power of death;" (Note, Heb. 2:14,15.) both in the world and in the church; above all creatures visible and invisible; during time and to eternity. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) For "it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell." It seemed good to him, that all the plenitude of divine power, authority, wisdom, knowledge, holiness, justice, truth, mercy, grace, even all "the fulness of God," should dwell in the Person of Christ; and be exercised and communicated, through his human nature, by virtue of the union of the Deity and humanity in his mysterious Person; that believers from his fulness might receive the rich supply of their various and urgent wants. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, John 1:16.) Thus "it pleased all Fulness," the original, infinite, inexhaustible Fulness of Being and perfection, or of the Deity, "to dwell in" Christ, for the benefit of his church; (Note, 2:8,9.) that "having made peace," or laid the foundation of an honourable reconciliation of sinners, of every age and nation, to himself, "by the blood of his cross," and the satisfaction there made to divine justice; he might actually effect that reconciliation, both in respect of "things in heaven, and things on earth." (Note, Eph. 1:9—12.) "The spirits of just men" then in heaven, owed their reconciliation to the Saviour's undertaking for them and all on earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, who believed in Christ, were reconciled unto God through their union with him, and their interest in the atonement of his blood. (Note, Rom. 3:21—26.) Thus the whole became one church and one body in him: and they all will at length be translated to heaven, there to continue for ever in a state of perfect reconciliation to God, and friendship with him and each other. This seems to be what is meant by "all things in heaven and earth:" for, though holy angels become one family through Christ with redeemed sinners; yet they cannot be said to be reconciled unto God, as they never were in a state of enmity against him. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Rom. 5:7—10. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Eph. 2:14—18.)—Some commentators would wholly confine the meaning to man's being reconciled to God and his service: others explain it wholly of God's being reconciled to his offending creatures: but why should not both be included? For the atonement of Christ procured for all believers both pardon of sin and new-creating grace: that they might walk with God, in a state of mutual peace, and reciprocal friendship and love.

V. 21—23. The Colossians, among others, had been called to share these blessings. They were once "alienated" from God and his service, yea, "enemies to him in their minds," which had been manifested by their wicked works; so that they had justly merited to be treated as enemies: yet, by his rich mercy in Christ Jesus, they were now brought into a state of reconciliation. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 8. 5—9.) This had been effected "in the body of his flesh;" in the body which he assumed of our nature, that he might be capable of sufferings and death, as a Sacrifice to divine justice for the sins of men. In consequence of this, the gospel had been preached to them, and they were induced to believe it: thus they were justified "by faith, and had peace with God, through Jesus Christ;" and were also brought to love and serve God, by a mutual and cordial reconciliation: (Note, Rom. 5:1,2.) the intent of which was, that they should at length be presented before God so perfectly holy, as to be

"unblamable and unreprovable" even "in his sight;" their sanctification being rendered as complete as their justification had been when they believed. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Note, Eph. 5:22—27.)—This would certainly be the case with every one who continued in the profession and exercise of faith, like a building that is grounded and settled on a firm foundation; (Notes, 2:5—7. Matt. 7:24—27. Eph. 3:14—19.) and so was not, by fear of man, or by any delusion or temptation, "moved away from the hope of" eternal life, according to the truth of the gospel, which they had heard.—The Lord had commanded that this gospel should be "preached to every creature under heaven," and it had actually been published very widely, among Jews and Gentiles, without distinction of nation, or previous character; and of this gospel St. Paul had been made a minister and an apostle. (Marg. Ref. t—z, and on 6.) He uses a general term, "under heaven," commonly employed on similar occasions; the import of which may be learned from other places. (Marg. Ref. a.)—This last verse may be rendered, "Since ye continue, &c." implying a confidence of the sincerity of the Colossians, as evidenced by their steadfastness. But our translation is more obvious and literal; and perfectly consistent with the apostle's doctrine concerning perseverance: for many specious professors of true religion are "moved away from the hope of the gospel," "having no root in themselves;" fear of coming short is one grand means of the true believer's perseverance; and it was frequently the apostle's manner, by such intimations, to caution his readers to beware of deceiving themselves. —Mind, &c. (21)—In the higher powers of the soul, the intellect and reasoning faculty, as well as the will and affections, man is "an enemy to God;" so vain is the notion, that the opposition of reason to the sensual appetites, is the conflict "between flesh and spirit," of which the apostle elsewhere discourses! V. 24. The sufferings of the apostle came upon him, chiefly by preaching to the Gentiles: but the blessed effects of his ministry among them, and that of those who concurred with him in it, caused him to rejoice in all that he endured for their sakes: (Notes, Eph. 3:13. Phil. 2:14—18.) for he thus "filled up that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ." The sufferings of Christ perfectly sufficed for the redemption of "his body the church," and were an atonement of infinite value: nor could those of the apostle, in any measure, have made up the deficiency if there had been any. But the atonement of Christ must be received. It is received by faith; "faith comes by hearing;" hearing by preaching; and preaching was in those days inseparable from suffering: so that the apostle's sufferings in his flesh, for the benefit of the church, were necessary in their place, and could not be dispensed with. (Notes, Rom. 10:12—17. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) By them he "filled up what was behind of the afflictions of Christ;" as the sufferings of martyrs, confessors, and believers in general, form one aggregate of pain and distress, with those of the Head of the church, all of which is conducive and necessary, in different ways, to the complete salvation of the whole body. But the apostle might with the more propriety say this; as he suffered in the same cause, from the same persons, or those of the same character, in the same meek and patient manner, and from the same spirit of zeal and love, with his divine Master: so that his afflictions resembled those of the Saviour in every thing, except that the Saviour's alone were expiatory. (Marg. Ref.) Christ is also represented, as sympathizing in the sufferings of his disciples: and many think the apostle had in view the words with which the Lord addressed him, in the way to Damascus: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" In this sense the sufferings of every part of the Lord's mystical body are his sufferings: the former sense, however, appears by far the most suitable to the tenor of the passage. (Notes, 18—20. Eph. 1:15—23.)

V. 25—27. St. Paul had been made a minister of the gospel, according to the sovereign appointment of God, in his gracious dealings with him, and the stewardship of it committed to him; that he might "fulfil" the prophecies of the Scripture; in preaching to the Gentiles, and bringing them into the church. Thus he was employed to "make known that mystery," which had been hidden from men, during all preceding ages and generations of the world: but was at length manifestly revealed to the holy followers of Christ. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—12.) For to them it had pleased God to make known the immense abundance of his mercy and grace, as well as the glory of all his perfections, in this "mystery among the Gentiles." Not only was Christ, the promised Messiah, "God manifest in the flesh," preached among the Gentiles; (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) not only did he reign among them: but he actually dwelt in the hearts of true believers; "in" the hearts of multitudes of the Gentiles, by faith, and the power of his Spirit, implanting his love, renewing his image, and writing his law; which fully sealed and warranted their hope of eternal glory. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Notes, Gal. 2:17—21, v. 20. Eph. 3:14—19, v. 17.)—Indeed, it cannot be made intelligible, how "Christ among the Gentiles;" according to the interpretation of some learned expositors, could give individuals a warranted "hope of glory." (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:20,21. 3:17,18. 4:13—18. 13:5, 6. Eph. 1:13,14. 1 Pet. 5:10,11.)

V. 28, 29. This glorious and gracious Saviour was the great subject of the apostle's preaching, and that of his faithful fellow-labourers; who "warned every man" to "flee from the wrath to come," and from every other confidence, to this Refuge; and to beware of delusion in so important a matter, or whatever might draw them into any inconsistent conduct: and they "instructed every man in all wisdom," and in every thing which could render them "wise unto salvation," or wise to serve God in their several places. For they desired and aimed "to present every man," who attended on their ministry, "complete in Christ," perfectly justified, and at length perfectly sanctified. (Marg. Ref. o—t. Notes, 21—23. 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) In this, the apostle laboured with unwearied diligence: "striving" by every means to bring sinners to Christ, and believers to establishment and holiness: yet this assiduity and earnestness were not of himself; but according to the "working" of a divine power on his soul, which "wrought mightily in him:" exciting fervent desires after God and the salvation of souls; communicating vigour to all holy affections; raising him above all low and selfish aims; and supporting him in constancy, patience, and cheerful fortitude, amidst all difficulties and persecutions. Some would explain this power, to mean exclusively the miracles which the apostle wrought, but every one must perceive, that this wholly destroys the energy, and darkens the sense of the passage. (Marg. Ref. u—z.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle shows, how earnestly he prayed for the Colossians, and the churches which had not seen him; that they might be united in love, and thus comforted; and that they might attain to a clear knowledge of the mysteries of Christ, and not be seduced by deceivers, 1—4. He rejoices, as if he saw "their order, and the steadfastness of their faith;" and exhorts them to perseverance and thankfulness, 5—7; warning them against vain philosophy and human traditions; and showing that they were complete in Christ, 8—10; having in him the true circumcision, of which baptism was the external sign, 11—13. For God, "had quickened them with Christ," having forgiven their sins, and abolished the law of ordinances, by his cross, 14; on which he triumphed over principalities and powers, 15. They ought not then to submit to legal impositions, which were shadows of Christ, 16, 17; nor be induced, by vain pretences, to worship angels, or to any other observances of voluntary humility, will-worship, and self-imposed austerity, 18—23.

to thank God for those who show "their faith in Christ, by love to all his saints;" and also to pray heartily for them, (though they be not personally known to us,) when we hear a good account of them; for in these things [r]the communion of saints' principally consists.—The hope of real Christians is "laid up for them in heaven," out of the reach of enemies and disappointments; they have been called to partake of it, by "the word of the truth of the gospel;" and, blessed be God, the joyful message is "come to us" in this far distant region!—If we have "known the grace of God in truth," it "bringeth forth fruit," in our holy lives and spiritual worship; but if it has in no degree this effect on us, it will only aggravate our condemnation. This may be learned from "all the fellow-servants" of our common Lord, who faithfully minister in different parts of his church: for they all declare, that "love in the spirit," love of Christ, of holiness, and of the people, ordinances, and commandments of God, and the unreserved obedience of love, are inseparable from saving faith.

V. 9—14. It is not enough that we understand the grand outlines of divine truth: but we should also pray for ourselves, and for one another, while we use diligently all proper means, that we may be "perfected in the knowledge of the Lord's will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;" in order that we may "walk worthy of our vocation," please God in every part of our conduct, and produce every kind of holy fruit in abundance. (Note, 1 Thes. 4:1—5.) Thus we shall likewise "increase in the knowledge of God:" for a humble, upright, teachable, and spiritual mind, exceedingly helps the exercise of a sound judgment, in investigating the nature and perfections of God; and experience confirms the knowledge which faith receives from divine revelation. (Note, 2 Pet. 3:17,18.) This again tends to increasing simplicity in dependence on God, which brings strength into the soul; that, being invigorated with "all might according to his glorious power," the believer may be able to exercise "patience and long-suffering with joyfulness," under the most severe and long-continued trials and provocations. Indeed, we may well be very joyful and thankful to the "Father," if we have "the witness in ourselves," (Note, 1 John 5:9,10.) that "we are made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light;" having acquired a relish for those contemplations, and that holy worship, society, and felicity, in which the blessed spirits before the throne are incessantly engaged. (Notes, Rev. 4:6—11. 5:8—14. 7:9—17.)—Alas! "the whole world lieth under" "the power of darkness," and is the kingdom of the prince of darkness, except as divine grace rescues some from this destructive bondage, by "translating them into the kingdom of the beloved Son of God, in whom they have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins," without which there can be no salvation. The subjects of these two kingdoms, with their respective rulers, will shortly be removed to an eternal and unchangeable state; Christ and his people being collected together in heavenly felicity, Satan and his slaves being cast into outer darkness and despair. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. Rev. 20:11—15.) When these things are duly considered, we shall account it so immense a favour to be delivered from the kingdom of the devil, and translated into that of Christ, that we shall know ourselves to have unspeakable cause for gratitude, in the deepest scenes of adversity, and amidst the sharpest conflicts of temptation. For our trials will soon terminate, and we shall speedily find ourselves among those "that are come out of great tribulations," and are singing the praises of him, "who has washed them from their sins in his own blood."

V. 15—20. When admitted into heaven, and not before, we shall have some adequate conceptions of "the great mystery of godliness;" and shall understand, in another manner than we now do, the import of the apostle's energetic language, concerning the Lord Jesus, "the Image of the invisible God," "the First-born" of the whole creation; the universal Creator, Sustainer, Proprietor, and Lord of heaven and earth, of men and angels, of the visible and invisible world, and of all the hierarchies of cherubim and seraphim before the throne of God; all of which "were created by him and for him, and he is before all things, and by him all things consist." Let us then at present adore these mysteries in humble faith; and, instead of wanting material images "of the invisible God," or framing gross notions of him in our creative imagination, or vain speculations; let us contemplate the glory of our God in Christ Jesus, "the express Image" of his essential excellency. Here we may learn humble confidence, reverential fear, and filial love; and be prepared for spiritual worship, joyful communion with God, and growing conformity to his holiness; as dwelling in our nature, reconciling the world unto himself, "the Beginning" of our life, "the First-born from the dead;" "that in all things he might have the pre-eminence." Here we may become acquainted with the harmoniously glorious perfections of our God; and may approach him, and have fellowship with him, notwithstanding our exceedingly great guilt, and pollution, and infirmity. For it has pleased the infinitely glorious God, that "all fulness should dwell in Christ," both to relieve our weak apprehensions, and our guilty consciences; in our discoveries of his glorious majesty and holiness, through so encouraging a medium as the Person of Emmanuel; "making peace by the blood of his cross;" and reconciling all things in heaven and on earth, to himself and to each other, in this most gracious and astonishing manner.

V. 21—29. If we be convinced, that once we were "alienated from God, and enemies in our minds by wicked works;" and if we are now reconciled to him, by the incarnation, sacrifice, and grace of Christ: we shall not attempt to explain away, or presumptuously expect to comprehend, these deep mysteries: but we shall see a glory and suitableness in this plan of redemption, as uniting the honour of the divine law and government with the hope of guilty, perishing sinners, though much yet remains far above and out of the reach of our low capacities, and feeble conceptions of spiritual things: and, while we long to be "presented holy, unblamable, and unreprovable in the sight of God;" it will be impossible for us to abuse or pervert his grace, to encourage ourselves in sin. Many things indeed must try the faith of professed Christians: but every trial which we stand, and every temptation which we resist, without "being moved away from the hope of the gospel;" and every event which shows that we "continue in the faith, grounded and settled;" tends to assure us, that we shall soon "be presented faultless before our God, with exceeding joy." (Notes, Jude 20—25.) May this gospel then be successfully "preached to every creature that is under heaven." May numbers of ministers, like St. Paul, be raised up and sent forth, who may even "rejoice in their sufferings for the cause of Christ, and after his example: and may we all remember that our afflictions, when properly supported, conduce to the glory of God, our own salvation, and the benefit of "the body of Christ." Let us be thankful, that God has revealed to us those mysteries, "which were hid from ages and generations;" and has shown "the riches of his glory among us Gentiles." But, let it be observed, that these things can, even under the full light of the gospel, be known by his saints alone. "The secret of the LORD is still with them that fear him:" and we need not wonder to hear learned, ingenious, and very sagacious men, betray their ignorance of these mysteries; when we reflect on their pride, carnal mind, and evident contempt of the humbling doctrine of the cross; nay, their enmity against it. As Christ is preached among us, let us seriously inquire, whether he dwells and reigns in us; which alone can warrant our assured hope of his glory. This all ministers should "preach, warning every man, and instructing every man in all wisdom; that they may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." May we then, every one of us, thus labour with all earnestness, and by every method endeavour to promote the cause of Christ; and be careful to "strive according to that working, which worketh mightily" in those who simply depend on it and pray for it; and may we go forth in the strength and victorious energy of "the Lord almighty," to do his work and seek his glory, in the services of our several stations. Especially let us rely on it, and earnestly pray for it, both to animate and qualify us, and to render our labours suc cessful, if employed in the arduous but blessed work of the sacred ministry; and to animate, strengthen, and prosper all ministers, and especially all missionaries, in every region of the earth.

NOTES.—Chap. II. V. 1—4. The apostle was desirous, that the Christians at Colossè should know, what earnest longings he had experienced, and what vigorous endeavours and fervent prayers he had made for them, and the Christians of Laodicea, and all other churches, which had never seen him, in order to promote their spiritual welfare. (Marg. Ref. o—c.) He especially wrestled most earnestly with God in prayer, that their hearts might be encouraged by divine consolations, in every part of their duty; and that, in order to this, they might be united together in the most perfect love of one another; that so all envies, resentments, suspicions, and competition, might be excluded; which would otherwise certainly burden their consciences, inflame their passions, "grieve the Holy Spirit," and interrupt their comfort. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 3:12—15. Eph. 4:1—6,14—16,30—32. Phil. 2:1—4.) In this most cordial union, he prayed that they might attain and possess all those spiritual riches, which were to be found in the distinct, complete, and satisfactory understanding of the gospel of Christ, for this would exclude all doubt and hesitation, being connected with the "full assurance of faith" and "hope." (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, Heb. 6:11,12. 10:19—22. 2 Pet. 1:10,11.) that so they might confidently acknowledge, and profess their belief of "the mystery of God, even of the Father and of Christ," his beloved Son, as One with him, according to "the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh;" (Note, 1 Tim. 3:16.) "in whom" (or in which mystery) were "hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." These treasures were indeed hidden from the eyes of unbelievers: but the infinite wisdom and knowledge of God were more displayed in the Person and redemption of Christ, than in all his other works. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, Eph. 3:1—12.) All true wisdom and knowledge consisted in a believing and practical and experimental understanding of these mysteries, and such instructions as are deducible from them; yea, from this treasury all true wisdom and knowledge must be derived by faith and prayer; and all science or philosophy contrary to this are worthless. (Notes, Matt. 11:25—27. John 1:16. 1 Cor. 1:20—31. 2:6—9.) This the apostle insisted on, "lest any man should beguile them" into some specious delusion, by enticing words, or persuasive reasonings; such as plausible orators use frequently, for the purpose of imposing on the judgment by addressing the passions; or by assuming as true, what is specious indeed, but false: as if either heathen sages, or Jewish scribes, could teach any wisdom preferable to the mysteries of the gospel, or in any degree adding aught to it. (Note, 8—10.) 'It grieved the apostle to think how incapable he was rendered of serving them, otherwise than by his letters and prayers. Oh! that such language might inspire every minister who reads it, with a desire to use his liberty to the best purposes, and to exert himself, as under such confinement he would wish he had done!' Doddridge.—All the treasures, &c. (3) 'Let this be the firmest argument against cavillers, that without Christ there is no true wisdom.' Beza.—The language of the first verse renders it at least highly probable, that the apostle had not been at Colossè.

V. 5—7. The apostle, "though absent in body, was present in spirit" with the Colossians: he greatly interested himself in their concerns, and realized to his mind the prosperous state of their church, as made known to him by Epaphras. (Notes, 1:3—8. 1 Cor. 5:1—5.) Some think, that he had an immediate revelation concerning it; as Elisha had of Gehazi's conduct in following Naaman. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:26,27. 6:8—12.) By that view, however, which he had of their prosperous state, he was filled with joy and complacency; as if he had witnessed the orderly management, both of their private concerns, and of those of the church, as to the regularity and discipline maintained in it, and the steadfastness of their faith in Christ, notwithstanding the terrors of persecution, and the artifices of false teachers. (Marg. Ref. o—q.) As therefore they had, by faith, "received Christ Jesus" to be their Lord and Saviour, according to the several offices which he sustained for the benefit of his church, (Notes, John 1:10—12. 1 John 5:11,12.) let them continue in habitual dependence on him and obedience to him; let them seek all their wisdom, strength, hope, holiness, and comfort from him, and aim in all things to serve and glorify him. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, John 15:1—8.) Thus, being rooted in him as trees in a fruitful soil, and builded upon him as a house upon a firm foundation; and being established by living faith in him, according to the doctrine which they had been taught; they would become more and more steadfast in faith, and proceed in their course with fervent thanksgiving to God for all his benefits. V. 8, 9. It was especially requisite for the Christians at Colossè to be upon their guard, that no man might "rob them" (as victorious armies plunder the vanquished) of their hope and comfort, or turn them aside from Christ, by philosophical subtleties, and vain delusive speculations, which were opposed to the simple faith of the gospel. These were "traditions of men," which were delivered from one heads and teachers of the several sects of philosophers, and so handed down from age to age: and they formed "the elements," or first principles, of a supposed wisdom, suited to the proud, curious, speculating, and carnal temper of the world; but which was totally incompatable with the doctrine of Christ.—The Judaizing teachers seem to have blended their system with speculations borrowed from the Pagans, and their different sects of philosophers: thus the traditions of the sages, and those of the Pharisees, were incorporated; and the "worldly elements" of heathen superstition or philosophy were blended with legal and traditionary external observances. Unless something of this kind be supposed, it will be found difficult to understand the apostle's discourse: for he spoke of philosophical delusions and legal ceremonies at the same time; he argued against both of them at once; but he levelled his reasonings chiefly against the Judaizing teachers. (Marg. Ref. z—e. Notes, Matt. 15:1—6.)—To what he had before advanced, he here added, that "in Christ all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily." In the temple the Lord discovered his presence by the Shechinah, or "visible glory:" yet this was only an emblem, or shadow, of his gracious presence: but in Christ "the fulness of the Deity dwells bodily," or substantially, and all the divine perfections are exercised by Christ, as "God manifested in the flesh, through the mysterious union of the divine and human nature in one Person. When the apostle spoke of believers being "filled with all the fulness of God;" (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.) he evidently meant it of their receiving a rich abundance of all divine communications from God; and his in-dwelling in his people refers to his gracious and powerful presence with them. But "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily" in Christ, is language unspeakably stronger, and evidently refers to his being constituted the repository of all spiritual blessings, from whose fulness all believers receive (Notes, John 1:14—16.) For God, dwelling in human nature as in a temple, exercises all divine perfections, performs all divine operations, and communicates all benefits to man, through that medium. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, 1—4, v. 3. 1:15—20. John 5:20—23. 14:18—20. 2 Cor. 5:18—21.)—'Christ is not here said to be "filled with all the fulness of God:" . . . but the whole fulness of the Godhead is said to reside in him. Now Θειοτης and το Θειον, never signify the gifts of God, or the

V. 10. As Christ was completely qualified for his mediatorial work, by "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him bodily;" so believers are completely supplied with all they want, by their mystical union with him. "They have been completed in him:" being "in him," as members of his mystical body, and as quickened by his Spirit; he is "made of God to them Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption:" all their instruction, acceptance, holiness, deliverance, liberty, victory, and happiness, are derived from him by faith, in the use of his appointed means; and they want nothing, which they have not in him. They therefore can have no need to seek any additional instruction, wisdom, help, or encouragement, either from Jewish ordinances and traditions, or from heathen sages.—As Christ is also "the Head of all principality and power," all angels being his willing servants, and the whole creation being subjected to him: so Christians have no cause to fear any creatures, or reason to seek help from them. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 8:28—39. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Eph. 1:15—23. Phil. 2:9—11. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.)—The Judaizing teachers seem to have imbibed, and new modelled, the Pagan notions of subordinate deities; and, applying it to the scriptural doctrine of angels, to have introduced the mediatorial worship of them; with which they, at an early period, attempted to corrupt the Christian church, and not wholly without success. To this the apostle here evidently refers, as well as in what is said afterwards. (Note, 20—23.) But Christians could have no occasion to pay homage of any kind to those creatures, who, however exalted, were subjected to Christ their Lord and Redeemer.

Ye are complete.] Εστε πεπληρωμενοι. 1:9,25. 4:12,17.

V. 11, 12. The disciples of Jesus did not want the external seal of circumcision, in order to their acceptance, or complete salvation: for "in Christ" and by their union with him, they had the "true circumcision," which was not performed on their bodies by the hands of men, but on their hearts by the Holy Spirit; and in consequence of this regeneration, they were daily employed in "putting off the body of the sins of the flesh." Thus they renounced and watched against all the sins, to which their natural corrupt propensities excited them; and they had "crucified the old man," as propagated from Adam, whence all these evil lustings originated. This was the "true circumcision," which Christ himself performed on the hearts of his people, by his Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, Deut. 10:16. 30:1—10. Jer. 4:3,4. 9:25,26. Acts 7:51—53. Rom. 2:25—29. 6:5—10. Gal. 5:19—26. Phil. 3:1—7.)

For "the circumcision of Christ," seems rather to signify his work in the believer's soul, than his own personal circumcision: though that was a part of his mediatorial humiliation, by which the true circumcision was procured for them, and in which they are rendered conformable to him. (Marg. Ref. n.) Instead of the outward sign of circumcision, baptism had been substituted; which some suppose to be meant by "the circumcision of Christ:" this represented that death and burial with him, from former confidences, and sinful and worldly pursuits, which true Christians experience, in order to their being made conformable to him in his resurrection. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 3:1—4. Rom. 6:3,4. 1 Pet. 3:21,22. 4:1,2.)—The baptism of Jews and Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, implied their 'death unto sin, and new birth unto righteousness;' their entrance into the church and kingdom of Christ; the washing away of the guilt and pollution of their sins; and their dedication to the service of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in whose name, as the God of their salvation, they were baptized. (Note, Matt. 28:19,20, v. 19.) The same inward change had been signified by circumcision, which was administered to adult proselytes, and then to their infant offspring: so that no argument can hence be deduced against the baptism of infants. Notes, Gen. 17:9—12. Rom. 4:9—12.)—This conformity to the crucified and risen Saviour was effected, "through the faith of the operation of God, who raised him from the dead;" or, by a believing reliance on that effectual saving power of God, as displayed in the resurrection of Christ. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Note, Eph. 1:15—23.) It is, no doubt, an important scriptural truth, that the faith, by which we are united to all other blessings, is itself the gift and work of God: (Notes, John 1:10—13. Eph. 2:4—10.) and this has induced some expositors, and very many preachers, to explain the clause to mean, 'the faith which God has wrought in the heart.' This was the author's view, when he wrote the first edition of this work. But a careful examination of the subject has convinced him that this is rather imposing a sense on the apostle's words, than inquiring after the true meaning of them. The ablest Greek scholars are decided, that the idiom of the language will not admit of that construction: and certainly there is no instance in the New Testament, in which a similar mode of expression can fairly be thus interpreted. (Mark 11:22. Acts 3:16. Rom. 3:22,26. Gal. 2:16,20. 3:22. Eph. 3:12. Phil. 1:27. 3:9. 2 Thes. 2:13. Jam. 2:1. Rev. 2:13. 14:12. Gr.) It should however be observed, that though the clause does not affirm faith to be the work and gift of God, it neither teaches nor implies any thing to the contrary. Indeed this is taught in the subsequent verse. (Notes, 13—15, v. 13. John 3:1—8. Tit. 2:4—7. Jam. 1:16—18. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.)

V. 13—15. The church at Colossè, consisting chiefly of converts from idolatry, had not only been "dead in their sins," but in that carnal state of which "the uncircumcision of their flesh" was an outward token: yet God had "quickened them together with Christ," by virtue of his resurrection; having, in his death, provided for the forgiveness of all their transgressions, to the full benefit of which he had thus admitted them. (Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, 3:1—4. Eph. 2:1—13.) For Christ had "blotted out the handwriting of ordinances," the ceremonial law, which was, as it were, the bond of the ancient church for payment of the debt of sin, contracted by violation of the moral law; but which Christ the Surety had paid by his all-sufficient atonement, and so blotted out the debt. This "handwriting was against" the Jews, and contrary to them, as well as to the Gentiles: for it is observable that the apostle changed the person, when he came to speak on this subject, saying "against us," not you. (Notes, Matt. 5:17,18. John 1:17. Eph. 2:14—18. Heb. 7:18, 19. 8:7—13. 9:1—14,18—23. 10:1—18.) Not only was the ritual law a heavy yoke for them to bear; (Note, Acts 15:7—11.) but all its sacrifices and ablutions testified, that they were guilty and polluted: yet these typical expiations could not take away sins. So that the bond could never have been discharged, except Christ had come and made payment of it: and unbelievers among the Jews were under condemnation, by the testimony even of the ceremonial law; as well as for the additional sins which the multiplying of precepts necessarily occasioned. (Note, Rom. 5:20,21.) At the same time, the Gentiles, who had not so much as these typical expiations, were under condemnation as transgressors, and were excluded by them even from the visible church. (Note, Eph. 2:11—13.) But Christ not only "blotted out" the debt, but removed the bond out of the way, and "nailed it" as a cancelled deed "to his cross," that it might no more appear against his people.—The ceremonial law, therefore, and the whole Mosaic dispensation, having received their intended accomplishment in Christ, were of no more force or value than a cancelled bond: and the Gentiles, being admitted into the church by faith in Christ, and which they had openly professed by baptism, had no need of circumcision, or of any legal observances, and ought not to pay any regard to them. (Marg. Ref. z—h.)—Moreover, Christ had at the same time virtually deprived the "principalities and powers" of darkness of their usurped dominion; and made way for the subversion of their kingdom, which was before universally established throughout the Gentile world. For, by satisfying the justice of God for sin, he had removed the cause of fallen man's subjection to Satan; and made way for the preaching of the gospel to the nations, "with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven," to make it successful. So that he vanquished those enemies, when he hung upon the cross, 'triumphing over them by it, even by that cross whereby they hoped to have triumphed over him.' Doddridge. When he arose and ascended, he led them captive: and he made an open show of his victory, and manifested the triumphs of his cross, when, by the preaching of his gospel he proceeded to destroy Satan's strong-holds, and to rescue his captives in the different nations of the earth. Of these triumphs, the salvation of the dying thief may be considered as an earnest. (Note, Luke 23:39—43.)

V. 16, 17. Seeing therefore that Christ had cancelled the ceremonial law; let no man presume to judge and condemn the Gentile believers, as guilty, or as no part of the church, because they disregarded it: and let no Christian disquiet himself about such censorious judgments; which related to the distinction between clean and unclean meats, or the use of this or the other drink, or abstinence from it; or the neglect of the Jewish festivals and solemnities, the new moons and sabbaths. (Notes, Rom. 14:1—6.) Doubtless, this last related principally to the weekly sabbath, which, as observed on the seventh day, was now become a part of the abrogated Jewish law. For the sabbath, under the Mosaic dispensation, was a ceremonial and a judicial, as well as a moral requirement: the morality of it had no necessary connexion with the seventh day in preference to all others, save as that was appointed during that dispensation: but the appropriation of a part of our time for the worship and service of God is of moral and essentially immutable obligation. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Note, Ex. 20:8—10.) "The first day of the week," "the Lord's day," was the time kept holy by Christians, in remembrance of Christ's resurrection; and "the sabbath," in the New Testament, always signifies the seventh day, the observance of which the Judaizing teachers wanted to impose upon the Gentile converts: and "the Lord's day," not the "sabbath," is the scriptural term for this day of sacred rest. (Notes, John 20:19—23. Acts 20:7—12, v. 7. Rev. 1:9—11, v. 10.)—These things in general were "shadows" of evangelical blessings: but the truth, reality, and substance of them were found in Christ, resulting from his Person, work and salvation; and consisting in the holiness, peace, communion with God, and heavenly rest, which he vouchsafes to believers.—'In the law no kind of drink was forbidden, except to the Nazarites.'... Now... it is not improbable, that the elders, who pretended to have received from Moses and the prophets, by tradition, many precepts not written in the law, might enjoin abstinence from wine and strong drink, to such of their disciples as aimed at superior holiness.' Macknight.—Shadow. (17) Note, Heb. 10:1,2. V. 18, 19. As Christ was "the Head of all principalities and powers," (10) the apostle warned the Colossians, not to allow any man to rob them of that glorious prize for which they were candidates, by giving them wrong directions, or turning them out of their course. The original word seems to be taken from the office of those who presided in the Olympic and Isthmian games, and decided to whom the prize belonged. Now, if any man usurped authority of this kind among Christians, he would mislead all who willingly submitted to him; as well as domineer over their consciences. This was attempted by certain persons, who were "voluntary in humility," and induced, by an uncommanded and self-imposed degradation of themselves, to "worship angels;" avowing that it was improper for mean sinful creatures to come to God immediately with their prayers, and that it was therefore expedient to solicit the mediatory good offices of holy angels: and they aimed to persuade others to this practice. Thus, they ascribed divine honours to created beings; as if ever present with men in all places, and at all times, and acquainted with the sincerity and the desires of their hearts: nay, they seemed to intimate, that they were more compassionate and kind than the Lord himself! (Note, Ex. 20:3.) This might be called "humility," and indeed it was an abasement, to which a rational creature ought not to submit: yet, in fact, it originated in pride, and a most presumptuous intrusion into the supposed state of the invisible world: it substituted man's arrogant conjectures and speculations, in the place of divine revelation; and it was the genuine offspring of that self-wisdom, with which the carnal mind is so prone to be "puffed up." (Marg. Ref. n—q.) By thus exalting angels to the office of mediators, and worshipping them in that capacity; they especially dishonoured Christ, the "One Mediator between God and man," to whom as "God manifested in the flesh," such worship ought to be appropriated. They did not adhere to Christ, "the Head," and sole Mediator between God and man, or maintain communion with him; but, in fact, they departed from the grand principles of the gospel, by choosing and worshipping other mediators: (Note, 1 Tim. 2:5—7.) and as no sinner can approach God, or be accepted, but in and by Christ; so this error tended directly to ruin their souls. For all true believers are united to him, and receive all grace from him; they are compacted together into one body by their union with him and with each other, and by thus filling up their proper places, and performing their proper functions, in his church; as the human body is made up of many members, compacted together, by joints, tendons, veins, and other constituent parts, united to one head. (Note, 1 Cor. 12:12—26.) Thus Christians derive spiritual nourishment from Christ, through his ordinances: and, being knit together, they increase in knowledge and holiness, by the power of God, and grow up into nearer conformity to him. (Marg. Ref. s—z. Note, Eph. 4:14—16.)—It has before been intimated, that the Jews seem to have borrowed some of the Pagan notions, and applied them to the scriptural doctrine of angels: by these means, the Judaizing teachers had begun to corrupt Christianity with a new and refined species of idolatry. To what lengths the same principles afterwards carried professed Christians, in the worship of departed saints, real or imaginary, and the worship of images, as well as that of angels, especially in the church of Rome, is well known: and indeed it continues, in very many places, unimpaired to this day. But the whole has always been done in direct defiance to the apostle's testimony, which fully proves all such practices to be as contrary to the honour of Christ in the gospel, as the most gross, or rather acknowledged idolatry is to the honour of God in the law.—Many expositors bestow great pains in showing what heretics, or heretical teachers, the apostle had in view; and what sects of the philosophers had supplied, so to speak, the materials for these corruptions of the gospel. But it appears to me, that if Cerinthus, or the Gnostics, or any other heretics, had been then known, as avowing antichristian tenets; the apostle would no more have scrupled to name them, than he did to name "Hymeneus and Philetus:" unless he had thought that by naming some, he should be supposed to exculpate others, who, with some shades of difference, were equally corrupting the gospel. In like manner, the Stoics and Epicureans are named by the sacred historian, in the same way, as the Pharisees and Sadducees are; (Note, Acts 17:18.) and if Christiani y had been corrupted, exclusively, by the speculations of Pythagoreans or Platonists, it does not appear, why the apostle should omit to protest against them. But, if all the sects of the philosophers held notions suited to corrupt Christianity, then the reason is evident why the apostle names no one: and it is equally strong against our interpreting his words of any one exclusively. In fact, it is of immensely more importance for us to know what, than whom, he opposed: for if our attention be engrossed by the danger of ancient Christians, from this or the other sect, either of heretics or philosophers: we shall probably be led to forget our own danger, from papists, Socinians, philosophizing infidels, rational Christians, (as some falsely call themselves,) and all the varieties of superstitious and enthusiastical deceivers; against all of whom the apostle's words, as explained in an enlarged sense, most solemnly warn us.

V. 20—23. If the Colossians were indeed become "dead with Christ" to the ceremonial law, Christ having discharged and cancelled that bond, as well as to their Pagan superstitions and vices; why did they act as if they were still "living in the world," under a carnal dispensation, and strangers to a more spiritual worship and service? and why did any of them submit to those who dogmatically imposed legal observances, and human traditions of any kind on them? (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, 8,9. Note, Gal. 4:1—3,8—11. Eph. 2: 14—18.) The Judaizing teachers, having imbibed also the notions of the heathen philosophers, had crept into the church at Colossè, and with great eagerness inculcated their principles; and seem to have met with countenance from some persons there. These dogmatists called on them in a dogmatical and authoritative manner, not "to touch," or to eat such food, as was legally unclean, and not so much as to "taste" it; nor yet to handle any thing, which might pollute them: probably requiring them also to refrain from marriage. (Marg. Ref. c. 1 Cor. 7:1.)—The next words are differently interpreted. But the more general, and, as it appears to me, the best founded interpretation, supposes the apostle to refer to our Lord's words concerning the traditions of the Pharisees; and implies, that abstaining from such things, when not divinely prohibited, as supported the body by perishing themselves, could do nothing towards the salvation of the soul: as, all such things perish with the using, and could communicate no real defilement. (Notes, Matt. 15:10—20. 1 Cor. 6: 12—17.)—Typical instructions had, in former ages, been conveyed by the ritual law; but its obligation had now ceased, and it was of no more authority, than "the tradition of the elders," and other doctrines and commandments of human invention, which the false teachers added to it.—"The worship of angels," and the distinction of meats, had "a show of wisdom," which might impose on the injudicious and superficial. To add voluntarily to the rule of duty, and thus to render it more strict, had a semblance of great devotion and extraordinary sanctity: but it implied that God had given a defective rule; and that he would be pleased with what he had never commanded. (Notes, Deut. 4:2. Prov. 30:5,6. Rev. 22:18—21, vv. 18,19.) It might also appear very "humble" to worship angels; yet this arose from abominable pride and unbelief. (Note, 18,19.) The abstaining from meats, with various self-imposed austerities, might have a show of extraordinary spirituality, by which the body was neglected, from an affected superiority to animal indulgence, and willingness for mortification and suffering: yet all this was not "in any honour" to God, or any thing valuable in itself: nay, the whole tended to "satisfy," in a dishonourable manner, the propensities of the flesh, or "the carnal mind," by gratifying self-will, self-wisdom, self-righteousness, bigotry, and contempt of others. (Marg. Ref. h, i.)—The last clause is differently interpreted.—'Nor are they of any value, as they regard those things by which the flesh is gratified, (or pampered.) Beza. By "the flesh," he means "the carnal mind," which is gratified with every thing that affords nutriment to pride, self-preference, and contempt of others.—'"Not by any provision for satisfying the flesh:" τιμη' (honour) 'sometimes in Scripture signifies the food and clothing necessary for the body. ... Thus the provision of the necessaries and conveniences of life, made for parents, elders, and widows, is called τιμη. (1 Tim. 5:17.) The body is as real a part of our nature as the soul, and ought to have such food and recreation, as are necessary to its health and vigour. ... The wisdom which teaches the "neglecting of the body," is not wisdom, but folly.' Macknight.—'Forbidding marriage, which "is honourable in all."—And allowing no honourable means of satisfying those desires which are implanted by nature, ... brought them to all dishonourable lusts.' Hammond. If this last meaning could be clearly made out, and established, it would very well suit the context. For it can hardly be doubted, that the Holy Spirit led the apostle to speak against the corruptions, by which certain Judaizing and speculating teachers, grafting the heathen philosopher, so to speak, on the superstitious Pharisee, attempted to corrupt the church, in language strictly prophetical of the subsequent corruptions of the "man of sin," the papal antichrist. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)—But it can hardly be supposed, that the words translated "satisfying the flesh," which seems to imply full gratification, even to repletion, would have been used by the apostle in this connexion: so that, on the whole, the first interpretation appears to me the most satisfactory. 'While it puffed up men with a vain conceit of their own sanctity; it might rather be said to tend to the dishonourable satisfying "of the flesh," while it seemed most to afflict it: for that self-complacency, ostentation, and contempt of others, with which these severities are often attended, is indeed a carnal principle: nor could the grossest sensualities be more contrary to the will of God, and the genius of true religion.' Doddridge.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. They, who in some good measure know the worth of immortal souls, will seek and pray for the salvation of sinners all over the earth: and such as greatly love their brethren, will earnestly strive for the establishment and progress even of those whom they have not seen; and, when they can do nothing else, they may "wrestle with God" in prayer for them.—The hearts of Christians are commonly comforted and animated, in proportion as they are "knit together in love:" and there are riches in "the full assurance of understanding" of the gospel, with which believers in general are but little acquainted. Indeed, there is an inexhaustible mine of most precious treasure in the word of God; from which men are enriched, in proportion to the simplicity, humble teachableness, diligence, and perseverance, with which they seek it. (Notes, 3:16,17. Prov. 2:1—9. Matt. 13:44.)—We cannot comprehend "the mystery of God, even of the Father and of Christ;" but we may believe, ac-

CHAPTER III.

The apostle exhorts Christians to "seek" and "set their affections on things above," as risen with Christ, and as following him to heaven, 1—4: to mortify all carnal lusts, to put away malice, and to seek conformity to Christ in holiness, 5—11; especially in love of each other, readiness to forgive injuries, and gratitude to God, 12—15: to "let the word of Christ dwell in them richly;" to abound in grateful praises; and to "do all things in the name of Christ," 16, 17. He gives exhortations to wives and husbands, 18, 19; to children and parents, 20, 21; and to servants, 22—25.

IF ye then be [a]risen with Christ, [b]seek those things which are above, [c]where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

2 [d]Set your [e]affection on things above, [e]not on things on the earth.

3 For ye [f]are dead, and [g]your life is [h]hid with Christ in God.

4 When Christ, who is [i]our Life, shall [k]appear, then shall [l]ye also appear with him in glory.

5 [m]Mortify therefore your [n]members which are upon the earth; [o]fornication, uncleanness, [p]inordinate affection, [q]evil concupiscence, and [r]covetousness, which is idolatry:

knowledge, contemplate, and adore. Thus we shall derive, from the treasures laid up in our Emmanuel, supplies of wisdom and knowledge, far more valuable than all man's boasted science and philosophy: but these treasures are "hidden" from the proud and unbelieving, and can be discovered and appropriated only by faith. We have peculiar need to insist on these things in the present day, when so many are employed in "beguiling men with enticing words;" extolling the powers of human reason, and depreciating revelation; deriding theology, and idolizing philosophy; boasting of demonstration and experiment in natural science; rejecting unanswerable evidences of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures; and treating all experience of the power of divine grace in the heart with the most sovereign contempt. While multitudes of frivolous and superficial speculators are thus "beguiled" into infidelity, skepticism, or destructive perversions of Christianity; it must rejoice every established believer and every zealous minister, to know that there is yet a remnant to be found, and an increasing remnant, dispersed through the land, and divers nations, who "walk orderly," according to the obedience and worship of the gospel, and "are steadfast in the faith" of Christ: with these he will find his heart united; and, if he have opportunity, he will exhort them to "walk in Christ," even as they have received him to be their Prophet, Priest, and King; that, being "rooted in him, and built up on him," they may be steadfast in the faith, and fruitful in every good work, "abounding therein with thanksgiving," and holy joy and exultation.

V. 8—17. Let young persons, and inquirers after the truth, especially beware, "lest any man spoil them through philosophy." They may depend upon it, that all the boasted knowledge which is opposed to the mysteries of the Person and redemption of Christ, is "a vain deceit,' a "worldly wisdom;" like that of Jewish scribes who crucified Christ, or that of heathen philosophers who counted the preaching of the cross to be foolishness. Men cannot follow such vain delusions, and be the disciples of Christ: for "in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." All true Christians glory in this "great mystery of godliness;" and all who oppose it are strangers to the life of faith, and the way to the Father. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. John 14:4—6, v. 6.)—Without union and communion with Christ, and with the Father through him, by "the supply of his Spirit," we can do nothing: (Note, John 15:3—5.) but true Christians are "complete in him." They derive all things which they want from his fulness: and they are safe in his keeping, who is the Head of "all principality and power."—If we enter into the spirit of genuine Christianity, we have no occasion either for Jewish ceremonies, or newly-invented superstitions. "The circumcision of the heart," the "crucifixion of the flesh," the death and burial to sin and the world, and the resurrection to newness of life, implied in baptism, and connected with "faith of the operation of God," sufficiently prove that our sins are forgiven, our debt is blotted out and cancelled, and that we are fully delivered from the curse of the law. He, who "triumphed upon the cross" over the principalities and powers of darkness, will also, from his glorious throne, defend us from all their assaults and stratagems, till he has made us "more than conquerors." (Notes, Rom. 8:33—39. 16:17—20.) We want no other wisdom, righteousness, strength, holiness, liberty, or victory, than those which Christ bestows. We need not regard those who "judge us in respect of meats and drinks, and holy-days," or other human traditions, which are not so much as "a shadow of things to come," as Jewish ceremonies once were: but we enjoy the substance in Christ, living by faith in him, and walking in his ordinances and commandments blameless.

V. 18—23. Having one all-sufficient "Advocate with the Father," we want no other mediators; and must not by any means abase ourselves to worship fellow-servants, to the great dishonour of our common Lord. (Notes, Rev. 19:9,10. 22:8,9.) Such voluntary self-degradation is real pride, which refuses submission to the teaching, righteousness, and authority of God: and it is the genuine effect of "a carnal mind, puffed up" with imagined knowledge, and "vainly intruding into those things which are not seen." The church has long enough been corrupted, and souls deceived, with these gross delusions, with human inventions, "will-worship," and self-imposed austerities: men have long enough been misled by those who said, "Touch not, taste not, handle not;" concerning such "things as perish with the using." But, whatever show there may be of wisdom, sanctity, or mortification in these devices, they certainly are worthless in themselves, they neither honour nor please God; and they gratify the proud self-preference, the domineering bigotry, and the persecuting temper of the carnal heart of man. Let us then not depart from the simplicity of our dependence on the Lord Jesus, and obedience to him. He is our Head of authority and influence, "from whom the whole body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God." As "dead with him" to the world, and its wisdom and maxims, let us willingly bear his yoke, and steadily assert our liberty from human impositions. What he has left indifferent, let us regard as such, and leave others to the like freedom; and, remembering the transient nature of earthly things, let us endeavour to glorify God by a temperate, thankful, and charitable use of them.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—4. If the Christians at Colossè were indeed "risen with Christ," as their baptism and profession, and former consistent conduct implied, it behooved them to show it more and more, and to press forward in the divine life, by "seeking those things which are above." (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 2:11—15. Rom. 6:1—11. Eph. 1:15—23. 2:4—10. 1 Pet. 4:1—6.) Perfect knowledge, holiness, and felicity, in the immediate presence of God, and in his service and love, are evidently intended by "the things which are above." The assured hope, and the happy earnests and first-fruits of these, they ought to seek; with the most decided preference to all worldly interests or pleasures, and in the diligent use of all appointed means. Thus they should follow Christ their Forerunner: that, as they were become "dead to sin and alive to God," in conformity to his death and resurrection, so they might be conformed to him in his ascension into heaven: where, as their Surety, he was exalted on the mediatorial throne, at the right hand of the Father, to appear in his presence and prepare a place for them. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Rom. 8:35—39. Heb. 9:24—26.) By faith beholding his glory, and aspiring in hope to this heavenly inheritance, they ought to value, choose, savour, pursue, and delight in spiritual and heavenly things, and not in earthly things. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Matt. 6:19—21. Rom. 8:5—9. 2 Cor. 4:13—18.) For, according to their profession, and the apostle's confidence respecting them, they were already "dead" to their former hopes, interests, motives, and pursuits; all the main springs of human activity seemed broken, "and their life was hid with Christ." The spring of that eternal life which abode in them, and from which all their present comforts, hopes, and activity were derived, was in Christ and his fulness: the streams of this living water flowed into their souls, by the influences of the Holy Spirit, through faith: thus they were united to Christ, and had communion with him; and wisdom, strength, grace, and comfort, were derived from him: he lived and ruled in them; and they lived in him, by him, and to him. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Note, Gal. 2:17—21, v. 20.) The Fountain of their life, and the nature, supports, and principles of it, were "hidden" from carnal men; who could not understand what were the secret springs of their active diligence and joyful patience, in opposition to all temporal interests and satisfactions. (Note, Rev. 2:17.) This life was likewise secured, as "a hidden treasure," from wicked men and fallen spirits, who could by no means deprive them of it: nor was it in their own keeping, but in that of Christ; by whom it was sustained, and who was himself the unfailing Source of it. Thus it was "with Christ, in God," through the union of the Deity with his human nature; and so the immutable power, faithfulness, wisdom, and love of God, secured it for them. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, John 10:26—31. 14:18—20. Rom. 5:7—10,15—19. 8:10,11,32—34. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) When, therefore, "Christ their Life should appear," to raise the dead and judge the world; then would every one of them, who thus lived by him "appear with him in glory," being made completely like him both in body and soul, that they might all be glorified together with him: and their comforts on earth, and the previous fel-

V. 5, 6. The exhortations here given are similar to those which have been already considered. (Notes, Eph. 4:17—32. 5:1—7.) The "members which are upon the earth," signify the various lusts of man's carnal nature, the members of "the old man," "the body of sin." (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, Rom. 7:22—25.) In the regenerate "the flesh is crucified with its affections and lusts;" yet there is still life in it. (Note, Gal. 5:22—26, v. 24.) It must therefore be daily "mortified;" a continual opposition must be made to all its corrupt workings; the supplies of its life must be as it were cut off; no provision must be made for its indulgence; temptations and occasions of sin must be avoided; and even lawful inclinations must be habituated to brook denial and delay. Thus the members of the carnal nature, which affects earthly things and disrelishes heavenly, must be continually enfeebled, and put to death by a lingering, unrelenting execution.—In the detail of particulars here adduced, we may observe, that "inordinate affection," may relate to inexpedient and excessive desires, after even lawful indulgences of any kind: though some understand it of unnatural crimes. "Evil concupiscence," signifies the sensuality of the heart and imagination, which must be mortified, or gross crimes will follow. But several expositors explain the word rendered "covetousness," as denoting rather the excessive desire of sensual gratification, than the love of riches. (Notes, Eph. 5:3—7.) This appears to me a most dangerous misconstruction; for by this means, sensuality is supposed to be forbidden with a needless redundancy of words, and "covetousness" escapes without the least rebuke: whereas, "the love of money is the root of all" kinds of "evil," and both the Scripture and matter of fact, show it to be one of the greatest possible hinderances to men's salvation, and the greatest of all snares to the professors of the gospel; nor can any vice so properly be called "idolatry," as avarice. (Marg. Ref. t. Gr. Notes, Eph. 4:19. 5:3—5. 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 9,10.)—"There being in us naturally "the old man," (9. Eph. 4:22.) and "the body of sin;" the inordinate affections and lustings of it are styled the members of that body; partly because they exert themselves by the members of the natural body; and partly, because as the members of the body are employed to accomplish the desires of the natural body, so these affections are employed to gratify the desires of the body of sin. ... As heathens place their confidence in idols, so the avaricious man doth place his confidence in gold and silver. ... The covetous person, though he doth not indeed believe his riches or his money to be a god; yet by so loving and trusting in them, as God alone ought to be loved and trusted in, he is as truly guilty of idolatry, as if he so believed.' Whitby.—By "the children of disobedience," some understand wicked men in general; and others seem to confine the interpretation to idolaters. But the word rendered "disobedience" often signifies "unbelief." (Note, Rom. 11:25—32.)—"It signifieth the want of the obedience of faith.' Leigh.—And "the children of disobedience" are doubtless all those, however distinguished, who do not believe and obey the gospel; while the most profligate and abandoned, believing and obeying the gospel, become the "children of obedience." (Notes, Eph. 2:1,2. 5:5—7. 1 Pet. 1:13—16.)—The rites of Bacchus and Cybele were peculiarly observed at Colossè, the chief city of Phrygia, and conduced exceedingly to deprave the morals of the inhabitants, in many of the things here spoken of: but alas! the case of immense multitudes, even in professed Christian countries, requires precisely the same warnings and exhortations.

V. 7—11. The Christians at Colossè had once habitually practised one or other of the above-mentioned vices, when they lived "among" those who were of the same character, and when they had no experience or expectation of nobler interests or satisfactions. (Marg. Ref. u.) But now, they must not only mortify these gross sensual propensities, which had acquired strength by habit; but they must "put off," or lay aside as a cast-off garment, all evil practices, especially those which are next recapitulated. (Marg. Ref. x—b. Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 4:20—32. Jam. 1:19—21. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.)—The word translated "blasphemy," may signify slanders and revilings, as well as profane speeches respecting God and holy things. These, as well as all polluting discourse, and falsehood of every kind, must be renounced; seeing "they had put off the old man with his deeds," by the mortification of the carnal nature, and by ceasing from the allowed practice of all sin. They ought therefore to avoid whatever was, in the least degree, inconsistent with their profession. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Rom. 6:1—11.) And as they "had put on the new man," and professed their conformity to Christ; and as this renewal of the soul after the holy image of him who had at first created it, (Note, Gen. 1:26,27.) and who had thus new-created it, was "in knowledge," or by the transforming "knowledge of the glory of God in Christ;" (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:3—6.) so they ought to act like men who were of one mind and judgment with the Lord, "hating iniquity and loving righteousness" in their whole conduct: or, "unto knowledge," that knowledge of God and his holy truth and will, which, rectifying the judgment, produces, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, a revolution in the will and affections, and so induces men "to walk in newness of life." All wickedness springs from ignorance and delusion in spiritual things; and "without knowledge the heart cannot be good." (Marg. Ref. d—h.) The Colossians were indeed fully admitted to all the privileges of God's people, and ought therefore to act in character. They were now members of the Christian church, in which all other distinctions were abolished. Greeks and Jews, circumcised and uncircumcised, illiterate persons of the most barbarous nations, the uncivilized Scythians, and the meanest slaves as well as freemen, were all equally made the children and heirs of God, by faith in Christ: their relation to him alone was requisite, and sufficient for their admission to all these privileges; (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:17—24. Gal. 3:26—29.) and he dwelt in them all, by the power of his Spirit transforming them into his own holy image, by which they were distinguished from all other persons. Christ was "all things" to them; (Note, 2:10.) and Christ was "in them all." (Marg. Ref. i—o. Notes, 1:25—27. John 6:52—58. 14:18—24. 15:1—8. 17:22,23. Rom. 8:10,11. Eph. 3:14—19.)—Lie not, &c. manifest in their whole conduct, a tender, compassionate, kind, lowly, unambitious, meek, and patient spirit; "bearing with each other, and forgiving one another," if any dispute, or cause of complaint arose among them, after the example of Christ's love to them. (Marg. Ref. q—z. Notes, Eph. 4:1—6,30—32. 5:1,2. Phil. 2:1—4.) Over all these, let them "put on charity," or active liberal love, benevolence, and good-will to all mankind. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. 2 Pet. 1:5—7.) This would be as the bond of union to all their other graces, and form their characters consistent. It would compact them into one body, and produce the most perfect state of the church on earth: as indeed it is the very "bond," which unites God and all holy beings, in the perfect happiness and holiness of heaven. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 1 Cor. 13:8—13. 1 Thes. 4:9—11.) And as "the peace of God," in their hearts and consciences, was the source of all their comforts; that peace ought to "rule within them," as the umpire of all their differences; that they might be influenced, by so endearing an example, to "live peaceably with all men." Especially this should teach them "to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:" because they had been called into a state of peace with God, "in one body," as united in Christ their Head; for which it behooved them to be exceedingly thankful, and to show their gratitude in this manner, and in every other way by which they possibly could do it. V. 16, 17. By "the word of Christ" the whole of the sacred Scripture seems to be meant; which was all from him, as "the Light of the world," and the personal "Word of God;" and which, in one way or other, all related to him. (Note, Rev. 19:9,10.)—It was very important, that the Colossians should, by diligent study and meditation, store their memories and understandings with the instructions of Scripture, that it might thus abundantly dwell within them; (Note, 2 John 1—3.) and that so their judgments might be formed upon it, their hearts cast into the mould of it, and their consciences directed by it. Thus they would be enriched in all "spiritual wisdom and knowledge," (Note, 2:1—4.) and would learn to act wisely in their whole conduct; or they would be influenced to use their knowledge in all wisdom, by reducing it to practice. (Marg. Ref. f—i.) This would enable them, with readiness and pertinency, to teach, caution, exhort, reprove, or encourage "one another:" while those psalms and sacred poems, which they sang together with holy affections, under the influence of divine "grace in their hearts," to the glory of the Lord, would furnish them with words suited to such mutual admonitions. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) Their idolatrous neighbours had laid up in their memories many songs, in praise of their abominable idols and imaginary deities, with their fabled exploits; and this had formerly been the case with those who now were Christians, which they used on every festive occasion, and when they met together for social intercourse; nay, for amusement and recreation when alone. In fact, it has always been the case, in every country; and the popular songs have an immense, but generally a most pernicious effect on the people. They are learned in early life, and not soon forgotten; and often are considered as proverbial or oracular.—Let then, Christians, excluding those polluting vanities, labour to get their memories and minds richly replenished with hymns and songs of praise to God; and poems of every kind, which are suited to prepare them for the worship of heaven, and to anticipate its joys; and let them use these hymns and songs constantly, not on public occasions alone, but in social meetings also; and even when alone in their houses, or when journeying, and indeed in any other situation. (Note, Eph. 5:15—20, v. 18.) This will also render them edifying and animating companions to their fellow Christians.—In general, whatever they are employed about, whether in conversation, in public acts of adoration, in social worship, in their secular or domestic concerns, in every thing relative to the place of their abode, their removal to other residences, their employment in life; the connexions which they form for themselves or their children; as well as in every work of piety or charity; let them "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus;" in a believing dependence on his merits and grace, out of love to him, in obedience to his precepts, and for the honour of his name, "giving thanks to God, even the Father, by him." For even the best services can be accepted from sinners, only through his intercession: and nothing ought to be ventured on or engaged in by them or any Christians, which cannot thus be done "in the name" and for the sake of Jesus the Saviour. sharply reprove even the defects of their endeavours to obey, without commending what is right; children imbibe the notion that it is impossible to please their parents, and so discouragement renders them careless. This would render the meanest employment "a service acceptable, well-pleasing unto God:" and, however such servants might fail of pleasing their masters, they would certainly receive an abundant, though gracious reward from God, especially in the heavenly inheritance. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The sincerity of our professed faith and love must be evidenced by a consistent temper and conduct: and we should prove that we are spiritually alive, as risen with our risen Saviour, by earnestly seeking and delighting in those "things which are above, where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God," in most decided preference to all earthly things, and with a holy indifference about them. Thus we shall know our interest in his atonement, by the life which we have derived from him; (Note, Rom. 8:5—9.) and may be assured, that "when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." This life of faith, however, and experienced communion with an unseen Saviour, must be hid from ungodly men, and frequently derided by them. Having such hopes and comforts, we should daily employ ourselves in mortifying every carnal affection, and in seeking a more entire deliverance, not only from all hankering after forbidden gratifications, but from "inordinate affection," and every desire of sensual indulgence, even if lawful, if not in any way inexpedient; and from that idolatrous "covetousness, which God abhorreth:" for "because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." In such practices and pursuits we might have been left to perish: for, whether we once "walked in them," or not, we were by nature prone to them, and should have lived and died among "the children of disobedience," if we had been left to ourselves. (Notes, Eph. 2:3. Tit. 3:4—7.) Let us then also put off anger, malice, slander, revilings, irreverent words concerning God, polluting discourse, and all kinds and degrees of insincerity: for a Christian should no more dishonour God and disgrace himself by any of these, than a courtier should dishonour his prince, and demean himself, by wearing squalid and ragged garments. Having therefore "put off the old man and his deeds," and "put on Christ," and being "renewed in knowledge after his image;" let us study more and more to copy his example, to have the same mind which was in him, and to act consistently with our rank and character.

V. 12—25. We may well be indifferent to all other interests and distinctions, if we be indeed true believers, seeing "Christ is all and in all:" but we should be earnestly desirous of evidencing that we are "the elect of God, holy and beloved," by cultivating every benign, friendly, humble, and gentle temper: and by copying the forgiveness through which we are saved: and by putting on that "love which is the bond of perfectness," that it may, above all, appear in every part of our conduct; while "we follow peace with all men," and are of one mind with those who belong to the Lord's body.—We should also seek to be enriched in divine "knowledge and wisdom," by a comprehensive acquaintance with "the word of Christ;" that, being familiarly versed in the Holy Scriptures, we may be "thoroughly furnished unto every good work." From this sacred treasury, we may deduce instructions for mutual admonition, while we unite in the worship of God, and in praising him "with grace in our hearts:" and as we shall be habitually led to "do all things in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God, even the Father, by him. By these means, our ordinary employments and relative conduct will be sanctified, and made a spiritual sacrifice. Thus the disobedient and disobliging behaviour of wives, and the bitter words and harsh conduct of husbands, will alike be precluded; because such things are not meet for those who are devoted to the Lord. Children will thus learn obedience to their parents, because "this is well-pleasing to the Lord:" and, from the same motives, parents will learn to exercise their authority with prudence and gentleness; not exasperating their children by violent anger or durable resentment, nor discouraging them by disapproving of their endeavours to please. Thus, servants will learn to be faithful, diligent, and conscientious in obeying their masters, from fear of God, and regard to his authority and all-seeing eye upon them. In short, true religion will teach every man to do the work of his station "heartily," from his soul, to the best of his ability, and with cheerful diligence, "as unto the Lord, and not unto men," in obedient faith, as the servant of Christ, expecting from him the gracious reward of the heavenly inheritance; and fearing, when tempted to do wrong, lest he should come short of that inheritance, or expose himself to the displeasure of God, who is "no Respecter of persons." These principles, and these alone, will render men universally conscientious, in all places and circumstances, from love to Christ, zeal for his glory, a desire of recommending the gospel, and of possessing the assurance that they are interested in its blessings. But that evangelical profession, which leaves men regardless of relative duties, and gives those with whom they are connected, just cause for complaint, is very much to be suspected; and the misconduct in the several relations of life, of many who are zealous for the doctrines of the gospel, is so evidently and habitually wrong, that there can be no doubt but they deceive themselves, as well as disgrace the cause. Let us then earnestly pray for grace, to enable us "to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," in these and in all other things; that the sincerity of our love may be evinced, beyond all reasonable ground of doubt, either in our own consciences, or in those of other men.

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1. (Note, 3:22—25.) The concluding verse of the preceding chapter relates to masters, as well as to servants: and the former are here more expressly exhorted to give their servants that support and recompense for their labours, which are just and equitable; implying care of them in sickness, provision in old age, and proportionable rewards for extraordinary fidelity and exertions. Thus they should in all things act towards them in a considerate and reasonable manner: not abusing their authority, but remembering their accountableness to their Master in heaven. (*Marg. Ref. V. 2—4. In order to the suitable performance of all the before-mentioned duties, the apostle exhorted the Colossians to persist steadily in prayer; watching against all indisposition and impediments; persevering, notwithstanding delays, temptations, and discouragements; and joining thanksgivings for mercies continually received, to their prayers and supplica-

8 Whom [y]I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate, [z]and comfort your hearts;

9 With [a]Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They shall make known unto you all things which are done here.

10 [b]Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner, [c]saluteth you; [d]and Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, (touching whom ye received commandments: if he come unto you, [e]receive him;)

11 And Jesus, which is called Justus, [f]who are of the circumcision. These only are my [g]fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been [h]a comfort unto me.

12 [i]Epaphras, who is one of you, [k]a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always [l]labouring fervently for you in prayers, [m]that ye may stand perfect and [t]complete in all the will of God.

13 For [n]I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in [o]Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

14 [p]Luke, the beloved physician, and [q]Demas, greet you.

15 Salute the brethren which are [r]in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and [s]the church which is in his house.

16 And when [t]this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea.

tions in behalf of themselves and others. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Phil. 4:3—7. 1 Pet. 4:7.) He especially excited them to pray for him, and his brethren in the ministry; that God would give them opportunity and boldness to speak "the mystery of Christ," for which the apostle was then a prisoner; (Notes, 1:25—27. Eph. 3:1—12.) that, both while thus circumstanced, and when set at liberty, he might "fully manifest" the counsel of God, concerning the way of salvation, and the calling of the Gentiles, as he ought to do, without fearing what man could do.unto him. (Marg. Ref. f—l. Note, Acts 4:29—31.)

V. 5, 6. "Wisdom toward them that were without," might perhaps be intended to include a prudent caution, not to expose themselves needlessly to their persecutors, to which some expositors in a great measure restrict it. But the words contain a general rule of great extent and importance; implying such habitual propriety, circumspection, and discretion in the whole conduct, as may preserve Christians from being ensnared or drawn into sin by their unconverted neighbours, and from giving them any unfavourable impressions of the gospel; and such an evident excellency of character, as may silence calumny, soften prejudice, and win upon the beholders, to examine into those religious principles which produce such happy effects. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, Matt. 10:16—18, v. 18.) Thus the Colossians ought to "redeem their time," in acquiring and exercising this heavenly wisdom, to the honour of God and the good of mankind: (Notes, Jam. 3:13—18.) in order that their conversation might not only be inoffensive, but "always with grace," the genuine language of piety, purity, wisdom, and love; savouring of heavenly things, as meat is preserved, and made relishing, by being seasoned with salt. (Note, Jam. 3:1—6.) By attention to these rules, they would "know how they ought to answer every man:" whether he asked a reason of their hope, and seriously inquired into the nature of Christianity; or desired a solution of some doubt or difficulty; or whether he were disposed to object, cavil, dispute, or revile: for the meekness of heavenly wisdom would dictate a pertinent answer on every occasion, and preserve them from disgraceful contentions. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, Prov. 26:4—6. Matt. 22:15—40. Eph. 4:17—19. 5:15—20, vv. 15—17. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.)—Salt. (6) The wit, smartness, or ingenuity, often accompanied with polluting or profane allusions, which was customary and admired among the Greeks, was called Attic Salt. Probably the apostle refers to this, but shows his readers a far more excellent way. (Notes, Lev. 2:13. 2 Kings 2:19—22. Matt. 5:13. Mark 9:13—50, vv. 49,50.)

Seasoned. (6) Ηρτυμενος. See on Luke 14:34.

V. 7, 8. (Marg. Ref. Note, Eph. 6:21—24.) These verses, compared with the parallel passage in Ephesians, show that the two epistles were written about the same time, and sent by the same persons.—Minister. (7) Διακονος. 'A deacon of your church.' Doddridge.—This pious writer has paraphrased the same word, in Ephesians, 'a minister and fellow-servant.'—It is almost certain, that Tychicus was much superior to a deacon of one particular church. (Notes, Acts 6:2—6.) He was rather an assistant of the apostle, like Timothy and Titus. The word διακονος is used with great latitude, and the apostle uses it of himself; (1:23,25. 1 Cor. 3:5) nay of Christ his Lord. (Rom. 15:8.)

V. 9—14. Onesimus, of whom we read elsewhere, (Notes Philem, 8—21.) and whom the apostle sent with Tychicus had been formerly an inhabitant of Colossè. The language used concerning him, shows how high he now stood in the apostle's estimation: and it also implies, that Tychicus was not "one of them;" that is, one of Colossè. (12)—Aristarchus continued with Paul during his imprisonment; but it is not certain, whether this was voluntary, or whether he was confined with him for the sake of the gospel: the latter however is probable. (Notes, Acts 19:23—31. 20:1—6. 27:1,2.) Marcus, or John Mark, nephew to Barnabas, was before this fully reconciled to the apostle; and Paul's unfavourable opinion of him was completely erased by his subsequent good conduct. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Acts 13:13—15. 15:36—41 2 Tim. 4:9—13.) Probably, the Colossians had formerly received some injunction from the apostle, not to countenance Mark as a minister; but he now reversed it: for he and Aristarchus, with one called Jesus, (a common name among the Jews,) and surnamed "Justus," because of his integrity, were the only ministers "of the circumcision," who had cordially united with him in preaching the kingdom of God among the Gentiles; and who had been a comfort to him, by their animating converse, hearty counsel, and zealous concurrence or assistance, in all his designs. (Marg. Ref. g, h Note, Prov. 27:9.) This is generally and justly urged, as absolutely conclusive against the traditions of the papists that the apostle Peter was at this time Bishop of Rome where he resided twenty-five years! It also renders it highly probable, that Luke was not a Jew, or a circumcised proselyte. (Preface to the Gospel according to St. Luke.)—Epaphras, a Colossian, a pastor of the church, and probably its founder, sent his salutations to them. (Note, 1:3—8.) He could not then attend his labours among them, being confined as a prisoner: (Note, Philem. 22—25.) but he continually prayed for them so fervently, that he even "laboured," agonized, or wrestled, with God for them; that they might be established in the faith, be steadfast and upright disciples of Christ, and complete in the knowledge and practice of the whole will of God. (Note, 2:1—4.) For the apostle could testify to the greatness of his zeal for the spiritual welfare of the Colossians, and of those other neighbouring churches, with which he had been connected.—Luke had long been Paul's beloved companion, in travel and in sufferings; he had been educated a physician, but he seems to have been an "evangelist," or preacher of the gospel in the various cities to which he went. With him Demas sent his salutations, of whom we afterwards read an unfavourable account. (Marg Ref. p, q. Note, 2 Tim. 4:9—13.)

V. 15, 16. Nymphas seems to have been an eminent Christian at Laodicea, whose well ordered family might properly be called a Christian church, or a society by whom the Lord was statedly worshipped. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 18:15—18.) The apostle directed this epistle to be read in the neighbouring church of Laodicea, as it was suited for general instruction; and that an epistle, which they would receive from Laodicea, should be publicly read among them. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:23—28, v. 27.) This direction has given rise to various conjectures: but probably the apostle had written to the Laodiceans, though the epistle was not preserved.—

'For all the epistles, which the apostles ever wrote, are not preserved; any more than all the words and actions of our blessed Lord.' Doddridge.—Some think, that the epistle to the Ephesians was intended to be a kind of circular letter; and that, by private direction, a copy of it was sent to Laodicea, to be thence forwarded to Colossè. Indeed, that epistle contains so little peculiar to the church at Ephesus, and so much important instruction of general interest, that this opinion, though probably unfounded, is not destitute of plausibility. (Preface to Ephesians.)

V. 17. Some suppose Archippus to have been the bishop of Colossè.—'That he should have been then bishop of Colossè, and that St. Paul should not write one word, or send one salutation to him; but send to the people at Colossè to admonish him of his duty, is not very credible.' Whithy.—'Archippus being old and infirm, ... received this encouragement from the apostle, to strengthen him.' Bengelius. It is far more probable, that he had been newly appointed to the ministry; and showed some symptoms of timidity or negligence: the apostle therefore sent a message to him in particular, charging him to take heed to his sacred ministry; and to perform fully the several duties of it, with diligence, faithfulness, boldness, and zealous affection; for the edification of believers and the conversion of sinners, by sound doctrine, a holy example, fervent prayers, unwearied labours, and every means in his power. For he had "received it from the Lord," being accountable to him for his conduct in it; he was warranted to expect his assistance in his endeavours to act by his authority; and he was bound to seek his glory, in a decided preference to his own ease, security, interest, reputation, or accommodation. (Marg. Ref. Note, Philem. 1,2.)

V. 18. The apostle wrote the salutation with his own hand, as usual. (Notes, Rom. 16:21—23. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. 2 Thes. 3:17.) He called on the Colossians to "remember his bonds" and long-continued sufferings for their sake as Gentile converts: this would confirm them in the faith, render them constant in enduring persecutions for the same cause, and induce them to pay the more entire regard to his admonitions: and he concluded with praying that the grace of God might be with them. (Marg. Ref. Note, 2 Cor. 13:14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. There "is no respect of persons" with God, and his ministers must act with similar impartiality, and instruct and exhort masters as well as servants, the rich as well as the poor, and rulers as well as their subjects, when opportunity is given them, in the duties of their several stations; and to render to their inferiors "what is just and equal, knowing that they also have a Master in heaven." None of these duties can be performed aright, except we "persevere in prayer," "and watch unto it with thanksgiving;" and it is "just and equal" that masters, professing godliness, should pray for and with their servants, and give them suitable instructions for their souls, as well as a comfortable provision for their temporal life.—Those who love the gospel should always remember faithful ministers in their prayers; beseeching the Lord to assist and prosper all their labours, and to enable them, with suitable plainness and boldness, to declare "the mystery of Christ:" (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:12—16. 4:1—4.) and they who are exposed to peculiar dangers or sufferings, in the cause of the gospel, should be especially remembered in the supplications of their brethren.—Great wisdom and circumspection are required in all our conduct, "towards those that are without;" with whom we are often connected in relative life, and engaged in secular concerns. They will certainly watch and scrutinize our whole behaviour; and sometimes artfully endeavour to persuade, entice, or provoke us to sin, that they may charge the blame on our religious principles: and they will make little or no allowance for our faults; so that even our indiscretions may produce an abiding prejudice against the truth. On the other hand, a sober, discreet, upright, faithful, and friendly conduct will frequently win upon them, and be greatly instrumental to their good. We ought then to "redeem the time;" that we may employ it in seeking wisdom from the word and Spirit of God; as well as in using it for the benefit of mankind. We should indeed store our hearts with good treasure, and seek to have them seasoned with wisdom and grace, that our speech may always be instructive, and suited to the persons with whom we converse; and that we "may know how we ought to answer every man," on whatever occasion we may be called to do it.

V. 7—18. Christians should desire to know one another's state: and mutual visits, or friendly correspondence, among faithful ministers and fellow-servants of Christ, may help forward this 'communion of saints,' excite their prayers for each other, and conduce to the comfort of their hearts.—What amazing changes does divine grace make in men's characters! Dishonest and worthless servants thus become "faithful and beloved brethren." Often "the first becomes last, and the last first," in the visible church: (Notes, Matt. 19:29,30. 20:1—16, v. 16. Luke 13:22—30, v. 30.) our fears of some who have misbehaved are removed, and they become "fellow-workers who are a comfort to us," while our hopes of others are grievously disappointed.—But "the Lord knoweth them that are his:" and we should always "labour fervently in prayer" for those connected with us, "that they may stand perfect and complete in the whole will of God;" in this manner testifying our zeal for them, when unable to render them other help.—Ministers, especially when they first enter upon their office, or when they seem wavering in it, should be seriously and affectionately exhorted, "to take heed to their ministry, which they have received of the Lord, that they fulfil it." For the smiles, flatteries, or frowns of the world, the spirit of error, and the various workings of self-love, turn many aside, or lead them into such a style of preaching and living, as comes very far short of "fulfilling their ministry," and "making full proof of it." Thus their own souls are endangered; their flocks are soothed into a formal profession, or deluded into error; and the promising hopes, which had been entertained of their usefulness, are lamentably disappointed. Let such persons, then, "take heed to themselves and to their doctrine," as those who serve the Lord Jesus; let them remember the counsel of Paul, his bonds for Christ, and his laborious, self-denying faithfulness, even unto death: for in preaching his doctrine, imbibing his spirit, and copying his example, we may expect that the favour and blessing of God will be with our souls, and prosper all the labours of our hand. (Notes, 1 Tim. 4:11—16.)

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

In the notes on the concise narrative of the apostle's labours at Thessalonica, it has been shown to be at least highly probable, that he continued there a considerable time, preaching to the Gentiles, beyond the "three sabbath days," on which he "reasoned with the Jews in the synagogue;" and that he was peculiarly successful. (Notes, Acts 17:1—9.) He was, however, at length constrained, by the persecution of the zealots for the Mosaic law, and the zealots for idolatry, who had formed a most unnatural coalition against him, to leave the newly planted church under heavy trials, and destitute of many advantages: for though it seems clear, that pastors had been appointed over them; yet, the pastors themselves must have been new and inexperienced converts. (Note, 5:12—15.) The apostle was, on this account, peculiarly solicitous about them; and Timothy having come to him at Athens, according to his appointment, he chose to be left alone in that city, that he might send this his faithful coadjutor to Thessalonica. (Notes, 3:1—10. Acts 17:10—15. 18:1—6.) But Timothy, returning to him at Corinth, brought him so good an account of them, that he was filled by it with joy and gratitude. He indeed exceedingly longed to visit them: but, having been repeatedly disappointed in his plans for that purpose, he at length wrote this epistle; which breathes a peculiar spirit of paternal love and affection, and shows that he considered the Christians at Thessalonica, as at least equal in faith and holiness to those of any church to which he wrote.—It is clear from these particulars, that this epistle was written from Corinth, and not from Athens, according to the spurious postscript; but probably soon after the apostle arrived at Corinth. This is supposed by some expositors to have been as early as A. D. 51; and by others A. D. 54; but, for reasons before given, a rather later date is here assigned to it. (Note, Acts 15:1—6. Preface to 1 Cor. Note, Gal. 2:1—5.) It is, however, generally agreed, that it was written before any other of the apostolical epistles; and some think, probably without sufficient reason, before any other part of the New Testament.—It was evidently the leading design of the apostle, in writing to the Thessalonians, to confirm them in the faith, and to animate them to a courageous profession of the gospel, and the practice of all the duties of Christianity, notwithstanding the persecutions and trials to which they were exposed. In pursuance of his grand object, he was led to mention, with high approbation, the manner in which they had received the gospel from him; and this almost unavoidably led him to speak of his ministry and conduct among them, in a way peculiarly instructive to the ministers of the gospel, in every age and place.—'It is remarkable, with how much address he improves all the influence, which his zeal and fidelity in their service must naturally give him, to inculcate upon them the precepts of the gospel, and persuade them to act agreeably to their sacred character. This was the grand point he always kept in view, and to which every thing else was made subservient. Nothing appears, in any part of his writings, like a design to establish his own reputation, or to make use of his ascendency over his Christian friends, to answer any secular purposes of his own. On the contrary, in this and in his other epistles, he discovers a most generous, disinterested regard for their welfare, expressly disclaiming all authority over their consciences, and appealing to them, that he had chosen to maintain himself by the labour of his own hands, rather than prove burdensome to the churches, or give the least colour of suspicion, that, under zeal for the gospel, and concern for their improvement, he was carrying on any private sinister view.—The discovery of so excellent a temper, must be allowed to carry with it a strong presumptive argument in favour of the doctrines he taught. . . . And indeed, whoever reads St. Paul's epistles with attention, and enters into the spirit with which they were written, will discern such intrinsic characters of their genuineness, and the divine authority of the doctrines they contain, as will perhaps produce in him a stronger conviction, than all the external evidence with which they are attended.' Doddridge. These remarks are well-grounded and important: but to suppose, with Dr. Macknight, that the apostle intended, as his main object, to prove the divine authority of Christianity, by a chain of regular arguments, in which he answered the several objections which the heathen philosophers are supposed to have advanced against him, seems quite foreign to the nature of the epistle; and also to be grounded on a mistaken notion, that the philosophers deigned at so early a period, to enter into a regular disputation with the Christians; when, in fact, they derided them as enthusiasts, and their doctrine as "foolishness."—It is remarkable, that the apostle, in writing this first epistle, found very much to commend, which he does unreservedly, and scarcely any thing to blame; though he saw it needful to intermix cautions and warnings, with his exhortations.—The exact, though manifestly undesigned coincidence of this epistle with the history contained in the Acts of the Apostles, which it tends to elucidate and confirm, is worthy of special notice.—It appears, that afterwards the apostle visited Thessalonica; (Note, Acts 20:1—6.) but nothing further is found in Scripture concerning this flourishing church, except the second epistle which the apostle wrote to it.—Thessalonica is now called Salonica, or Salonici, and is under the dominion of the Turks, and the inhabitants are generally Mohammedans.—'Our epistle concludes with a direction, that it should be publicly read in the church to which it was addressed. . . . The existence of this clause . . . is an evidence of its authenticity: because to produce a letter, purporting to have been publicly read in the church at Thessalonica, when no such letter had been read or heard of in that church, would be to produce an imposture destructive of itself. . . . Either the epistle was publicly read in the church of Thessalonica, during St. Paul's lifetime, or it was not. If it was, no publication could be more authentic, no species of notoriety more unquestionable, no method of preserving the integrity of the copy more secure. . . . If it was not, the clause . . . would remain a standing condemnation of the forgery, and one would suppose, an invincible impediment to its success.' Paley.—It may also be added, that the circumstance of this injunction being given in the first epistle which the apostle wrote, implied a strong and avowed claim to the character of an inspired writer; as, in fact, it placed his writings on the same ground with those of Moses and the ancient prophets.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle salutes the church at Thessalonica, 1; and shows how he thanked God on their behalf, and prayed for them; remembering the fruits of their faith, love, and patient hope, as evidences of their "election of God," 2—4. He speaks, more particularly, concerning the happy effects of his success among them: for, "receiving the word in much affliction," copying the example of their teachers, and setting good examples to others; their conversion from idols to the service of the true God, and their patient waiting for Jesus, the Deliverer "from the wrath to come," speedily became known in every place, 6—10.

PAUL, and [a]Silvanus, and [b]Timotheus, [c]unto the church of the [d]Thessalonians which is [e]in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ: [f]Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

2 We [g]give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

3 [h]Remembering without ceasing [i]your work of faith, [k]and labour of love, [l]and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, [m]in the sight of God and our Father;

4 [n]Knowing, brethren [o]beloved, your election of God.

5 For [o]our gospel came not unto you [p]in word only, [q]but also in power, and [r]in the Holy Ghost, and [s]in much assurance; as ye know [t]what manner of men we were among you [u]for your sake.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Silas, or Silvanus, did not come to the apostle, when driven from Thessalonica and Berea, till after his arrival at Corinth, nor did Timothy continue with him in that city, being speedily sent back to Thessalonica; (Notes, 3:1—5. Acts 17:10—15. 18:1—6.) so that the epistle could not be written from Athens. St. Paul joined these two faithful fellow-labourers with himself in this address, to express his affection for the Christians at Thessalonica, to whom they were well known. (Marg. Ref. a—f.) After his usual salutation and introduction, (Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. Eph. 1:1,2. 2 Thes. 1:1,2.) he observed, that he constantly remembered, and mentioned before God in his prayers, their "work of faith." They professed to believe in Christ, and their active obedience showed that their faith was living, and "worked by love" of Christ, and his ministers, truth, and cause: (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6. Jam. 2:14—26.) and that this powerful principle of holy love induced them to "labour" strenuously, in all things connected with the honour of Christ, and the benefit and comfort of their brethren. (Marg. Ref. g—k.) They professed all to "hope" in the promises of God, and to expect eternal life, as his gift in Christ Jesus; and this living hope rendered them "patient," and constant in their adherence to him, amidst tribulations and persecutions. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. Heb. 6:16—20. Jam. 1:1—4. 5:7—11.) These graces and duties they attended to, as "in the sight of God," even their reconciled Father; and the apostle was satisfied, from what he had witnessed, that they were his "brethren beloved," and "the elect of God" in Jesus Christ. This he did not speak as a matter of immediate revelation: but his favourable conclusion respecting them was drawn, by tracing back the effects of divine grace in their conversion, to the source of them in "their election of God." (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Phil. 1:3—8. 2 Pet. 1:5—11.)—The purpose of God, in calling the Gentiles collectively, could not be known in this manner; and indeed some of the Thessalonians were Jewish converts. And in what sense a remnant of Thessalonians (that is, a small proportion of the inhabitants of one city) could prove the national election of the Macedonians, those who adopt this opinion would do well to inform us. Some explain the words to mean election to external privileges, as Israel had been chosen: (Notes, Rom. 9:6—23.) but an external profession of Christianity was sufficient to prove this whereas the apostle grounds his confidence respecting the Thessalonians, on "their work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," "things which," no doubt, "accompany salvation." (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. Heb. 6:9—12.)—He had once indeed had his fears of them; but his subsequent tidings from them had fully satisfied him; (3:5—7.) yet, if any individuals did not show the same "active faith, laborious love, and patient hope," as the rest did; they were exceptions also to the apostle's general confidence, respecting the professed Christians at Thessalonica.

V. 5—8. The confidence of the apostle concerning the Christians at Thessalonica, as to their "election of God," was grounded on what he had witnessed: for the gospel, which he and his fellow-labourers preached, had come to them, "not in word only" it had not been left to its natural efficacy, or merely to the power of arguments and persuasion

6 And [x]ye became followers of us, [y]and of the Lord, having [z]received the word in much affliction, [a]with joy of the Holy Ghost:

7 So that ye were [b]ensamples to all that believe [c]in Macedonia and Achaia.

8 For [d]from you sounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also [e]in every place your faith to [f]God-ward is spread abroad; so that we need not to speak any thing.

9 For they themselves show of us [g]what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how [h]ye turned to God from idols, to serve [i]the living and true God; on their minds. Numbers had thus heard it in many places, who nevertheless continued to live in idolatry and iniquity: but "it had come with power, and with the Holy Ghost," or [k]with power, even with the Holy Spirit.' This cannot relate to miracles exclusively; for numbers saw miracles, who notwithstanding continued unbelievers: but the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit, accompanying the word of God, had produced such a full conviction of its nature and importance, and such an assurance of faith and hope, as had induced the Thessalonians, at all events, to embrace and profess the gospel; even as a ship is carried, by a full tide and a fair wind, over every obstacle, into the haven. 'A metaphor taken from ships, when they are carried on under full sails.' Leigh. (Marg. Ref. o—s.)—For "they knew" and observed, "what manner of men" the preachers of Christianity "were among them for their sakes;" while they witnessed their patience, self-denial, diligence, zeal, holiness, and love; and how they laboured with their own hands for a maintenance, that they might not be burdensome to the converts: and this induced them to attend to their doctrine. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 2:9—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.)—They not only appeared "holy men of God" to others; but were evidently such among their most intimate companions. Thus the Thessalonians were induced to join themselves to these despised servants of a crucified Saviour; they associated with them in divine worship; they copied their examples: and in doing so, they became imitators of the Lord himself. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, 1 Cor. 11:1. Phil. 3:17—19. 4:8,9. Tit. 2:7,8.) They indeed received the word into their hearts amidst great afflictions in their circumstances, and from their persecutors: yet they had such joy from the Holy Spirit, as made them ample amends. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Note, 2 Cor. 8:1—5.) In this manner they became examples, not only to their idolatrous neighbours, but even to believers in other parts of Macedonia, and in Achaia: for the gospel was soon spread from Thessalonica into those regions, perhaps by persons who went out for that purpose. In all places, whither the apostle also travelled, the report of the conversion and good conduct of the Thessalonians had arrived before him; and those who came to him from other parts, declared the same to him.

V. 9, 10. In every city the apostle met with those who joyfully mentioned his prosperous entrance, with the gospel, among the Thessalonians: (Notes, 2:1—8,13—16.) and how they had been converted from the worship of idols, (either dead men, or imaginary beings, or evil spirits,) to "serve" and worship "the one living and true God," by faith in Christ; and to wait for the Saviour's coming from heaven to raise the dead and judge the world, in believing and patient hope, diligent preparation, and universal conscientiousness. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, 2 Tim. 4:6—8. Tit. 2:13. Heb. 9:27,28.) For they were fully assured, that God the Father had raised him from the dead, and advanced him to the mediatorial throne, to reign "at his right hand, till all enemies should be put under his feet." (Notes, Acts 2:33—36. 17:30,31. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.) Him therefore they looked and "waited for," as the great "Deliverer from the wrath to come." To this wrath, both Jews and Gentiles had been justly exposed for their sins; and under this they must all have finally perished, if the Son of God had not become incarnate, performed his suretyship obedience to the law, laid down his life as a Sacrifice for sin, risen as "the Firstfruits of the resurrection," ascended into heaven to be the Advocate of sinners, sent forth his gospel to call men to partake of this salvation, and accompanied it by the power of his Spirit, to overcome the proud and carnal opposition of their hearts. Thus he had "delivered" believers from the merited wrath of God, which is coming, and will for ever be coming, upon all impenitent and unbelieving sinners. (Marg. Ref. n. Note, Matt. 3:7—10.) Of this deliverance their conversion was the sure evidence, and having this earnest and pledge of final salvation, they waited in joyful hope for that solemn season, which will complete the felicity of believers, and the destruction of the wicked. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It excites cordial joy and fervent gratitude, in faithful ministers, when they witness "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope, in the Lord Jesus," of those among whom they have preached the gospel. This puts vigour into their prayers and praises for them; as evidencing that they are "in God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ," partakers of "mercy, grace, and peace," "beloved brethren," and "the elect of God." But faith which works not obedience, professed love that declines self-denying labour, and hope which is separated from "patient continuance in well-doing," can never prove a man's "election;" all other ways of proving it are vain and delusory; and this scriptural medium is not capable of being perverted.—Alas! even the gospel, which the apostle preached, often "comes in word only;" and thus men continue impenitent and slaves to sin; or at most, become only notional formalists and mere professors of the gospel. This should excite all who preach and all who love the gospel, to "pray without ceasing," that it may every where, and at all times, be attended by the divine power of the Holy Spirit; producing, in the minds and hearts of men, that "full assurance" of its truth and importance, which alone can prevail with them to break through all hinderances, and make all sacrifices, that they may follow Christ and be partakers of his salvation. (Notes, Rom. 1:13—16. 1 Cor. 1:25. 2:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:7. 10:1—6.) This is "the work of God;" but he works by means: and when ministers evidently set before the people such an edifying example, that by imitating them they imitate Christ also, it is very conducive to their conviction and conversion. When this happy change is effected, and sinners join themselves to those who "walk as Christ walked;" they are often enabled to "receive the word," amidst poverty, contempt, and manifold afflictions and persecutions, with abundant "joy in the Holy Ghost." Thus they become good examples to their families and neighbours, and even to their fellow Christians the word of God sounds forth from them to others; and they zealously embrace every opportunity of diffusing this heavenly light. And when great numbers of careless, ignorant, and immoral persons, are turned from their idols and iniquities, their worldly pursuits and connexions, "to serve the living and true God;" to believe in and obey the Lord Jesus: to "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts; to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world;" and to "wait for the Lord Jesus from heaven," as 'believing that he will come to be their Judge,' and hoping and earnestly praying 'to be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting;' the fact speaks for itself: there needs little pains to spread the report, for it is a work of God which will be sure to be known, and rendered conspicuous by its own light. May he then send forth ministers into all parts of the world, attended by his power, and thus made abundantly successful, in the conversion of the nations to the worship of the living God, and the obedience of faith in his beloved Son!—But let us remember, "that the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." (Note, Rom. 1:18—20.) All temporal miseries, terminating in death, are the effects of that wrath: Jesus did not come to deliver us from these sufferings, but from "the wrath to come," the everlasting misery of hell. None but Jesus can deliver any man from this merited condemnation: all who believe in him, with an obedient faith, are delivered from it, and on all others "the wrath of God still abideth." For if indeed all true Christians once were exposed to this wrath; all they, whom "Jesus has not delivered," must be still exposed to it. (Notes, John 3:19—21,27—36, v. 36.) Let us then examine this infinitely important matter, with proportionable seriousness and fervency of prayer; let us "give diligence to make our calling and election sure;" and if we have obtained this assurance, let us remember the price which our deliverance cost the great

CHAPTER II.

The apostle reminds the Thessalonians of his affectionate, faithful labours, and holy manner of life, among them, 1—12. He expresses his satisfaction, as to the manner in which they had received the gospel; and their constancy amidst persecution, 13, 14: and speaks of the guilt and ruin of the unbelieving Jews, especially for opposing the gospel's being preached to the Gentiles, 15, 16. He shows his joy on the account of the Thessalonians, his desire of seeing them again, and his hope of a joyful meeting at the coming of Christ, 17—20.

FOR yourselves, brethren, know [a]our entrance in unto you, that it was not [b]in vain:

2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were [c]shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were [d]bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with [e]much contention.

3 For [f]our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile;

4 But as [g]we were allowed of God [h]to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak; [i]not as pleasing men, [k]but God, which trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time [l]used we flattering words, as ye know, nor [m]a cloak of covetousness; [n]God is witness:

6 Nor [o]of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, [p]when we might have [q]been burdensome, [r]as the apostles of Christ.

7 But [s]we were gentle among you, even [t]as a nurse cherisheth her children:

8 So being [u]affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, [x]but also our own souls, because ye were [y]dear unto us.

9 For ye remember, brethren, [z]our labour and travail: for labouring [a]night and day, because we would not be [b]chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you [c]the gospel of God.

10 Ye are [d]witnesses, and God also, [e]how holily, and justly, and unblamably we behaved ourselves among you that believe:

11 As ye know [f]how we exhorted, and comforted, and [g]charged every one of you, [h]as a father doth his children, 12 That ye would [i]walk worthy of God, [k]who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

Redeemer, that humble love may constrain us devotedly to obey him, and cheerfully to suffer for him. But, if any are conscious that they have not experienced this deliverance, let them take warning, without delay, "to flee from the wrath to come," and to seek refuge in Christ and his salvation. (Note, Heb. 6:16—20.)

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—8. The Christians at Thessalonica well knew that the apostle and his fellow-labourers did not come among them with empty speculations, or in an inefficacious manner; but they were sensible, that it was a well-grounded testimony, and not a vague report, which had been spread abroad concerning them: and by the external proof of miracles and the internal efficacy of divine grace, it had been rendered successful. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 13—16, v. 16. 1:9,10. Is. 55:10—13.) For he and his company having been, by immediate revelation, directed to go into Macedonia: they did not yield to discouraging fears, even when they had suffered the most severe, ignominious, and iniquitous usage at Philippi: (Notes, Acts 16:6—12,19—28, 35—40.) but as soon as they were set at liberty, they came to Thessalonica; and there boldly, in dependence on God, and from zeal for his glory, they preached that gospel, of which he was the Author. (Note, Acts 17:1—9.) This they did, with great earnestness of spirit, and strong desires of usefulness: and with the most constant perseverance, notwithstanding the opposition of the Jews, the disputings which they were constrained to maintain with them, and the persecutions which they endured. (Marg. Ref. c—e.) For their exhortations were not suited to beguile men, either into erroneous and delusive opinions, or licentious practices; nor had they any sinister or selfish motives. On the contrary, they were most fully assured of the divine authority and excellency of the doctrine which they taught; and conscious of the utmost integrity, purity, and sincerity, in their endeavours to propagate it. For as they had been "approved by God" himself, and marked out to be "stewards of his mysteries," and intrusted with the gospel; so they had spoken with the most simple and sincere desire of approving themselves faithful to him, and meeting with his acceptance: knowing that he would scrutinize, and prove as by fire, the secret intentions of every heart. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. 4:3—5. Rev. 2:20—23, v. 23.) They had not indeed at all sought to "please men," for the sake of their own ease, interest, reputation, or accommodation; or in any way, except as conducive to their edification. (Notes, Rom. 15:1—3. 1 Cor. 4:1—5. Gal. 1:6—10.) They had never, on any occasion, employed "flattering words," to sooth their hearers into a delusive opinion of their own good estate or character, to palliate their sins, or to commend their endowments or virtues. (Notes, Job 32:18—22. Prov. 29:5.) This the Thessalonians knew; being sensible, that they addressed them in the plainest and most convincing language: and "God himself was witness," that they had never made religion, or their ministry, "a cloak" to cover any avaricious designs. Nor had they courted applause, or aimed at popularity, or aspired at authority and honour, among them or any other Christians; on the contrary, they even receded from their due, and would not burden them by requiring a maintenance. This was a mark of respect which the other apostles generally received from the churches; and Paul had as just a claim to it as they: but he did not insist upon it, either for himself or his companions; because he was aware, that it would have been "burdensome" to the people, as they were in low circumstances. (Marg. Ref. l- r. Notes, 1 Cor. 9:13—18. 2 Cor. 8:1—5. 11:7—12. 12:11—16.) In this and in all other respects, they had imitated "the gentleness" of a nursing mother, to her own beloved infant; whom she deems it a pleasure to suckle and attend on, and has the desired recompense of her disinterested assiduity, when it thrives and is in health. Thus, being "affectionately desirous" of their spiritual growth and prosperity, they were not only willing to impart the gospel to them; but the tenderest feelings of their hearts accompanied their labours. They readily spent their strength, employed all their knowledge and ability, exhausted their spirits, and even ventured their lives for them, "because they were become dear to them;" and they desired no other recompense, than the "furtherance and joy of faith" of their beloved people. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, 2 Cor. 1:23,24. Phil. 1:21—26.)

V. 9—12. The Thessalonians could well remember the disinterested and fatiguing labour of the apostle and his fellow-labourers: for they not only employed the day in the various parts of their ministerial duty, or in working for a subsistence; but they bereaved themselves of rest, often spending the whole or a considerable part of the night, in the same manner: lest, by being "chargeable unto any of" their hearers, they should prevent their own success. (Marg. Ref. z—b. Note, 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) Thus they faithfully preached to them the gospel of God: and the Thessalonians could testify, (as the Lord himself also would,) in what a holy, upright, and blameless manner they behaved themselves: not only in those things which unbelievers might have noticed, but also in their most retired and intimate behaviour among such as believed the gospel: so that none of them had seen any thing but what evinced the greatest purity, probity

13 For this cause also [l]thank we God without ceasing, [m]because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) [n]the word of God, which [o]effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, [p]became followers of [q]the churches of God which in Judea [r]are in Christ Jesus: for [s]ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, [t]even as they have of the Jews:

15 Who both [u]killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have [v]persecuted us; and they [x]please not God, and are [y]contrary to all men:

16 [z]Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles [a]that they might be saved, [b]to fill up their sins always: [c]for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time [d]in presence, not in heart, [e]endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire.

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you, [f]even I Paul, [g]once and again; but [h]Satan hindered us.

19 For what is [i]our hope, or joy, or [k]crown of [l]rejoicing? Are not even ye [i]in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

sincerity, and holy love. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Note, 1:5—8.) They had also exhorted and animated them, with every affectionate and consolatory topic, and "charged" them with all authority, as testifying the will of God concerning them, to copy their example. This they did, not only in general, publicly, but privately to "every one of them," as the case might require. And as a wise and affectionate father uses arguments, persuasions, encouragements, and commands, in directing the conduct of his children; so they had used the same means, of inducing them to walk worthy of the holy perfections of that God whom they worshipped, the example of his love and mercy to them, and their immense obligations to him, who had so graciously translated them from "the power of darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son," that they might be trained up on earth, for the eternal glory and holy felicity of heaven. V. 13—16. The apostle and his friends thanked God continually, because the Christians at Thessalonica, when they received "the word of God which they had heard from them, did not receive it as the word of man." This might be disputed against, rejected, or even derided; or it might be received and believed in part, but not wholly or implicitly, without material criminality or detriment, however plausible or ingenious it were. On the contrary, "they had received it as the word of God," which it certainly was; and had accordingly reverenced it, submitted to it, and implicitly obeyed it. Thus it had effectually wrought in their hearts repentance of sin, hatred of idolatry, faith in Christ, love to him and his cause, delight in the worship and service of God, a supreme valuation of his favour, and a realizing view of eternal things. (Marg. Ref. l—o. Notes, 1:5—8. Rom. 1:13—16. Col. 1:3—8.) In this manner, they became "imitators" of the Christian churches in Judea, in doctrine, worship, and holy obedience: and they adhered to the truth and will of Christ, patiently and cheerfully, amidst the persecutions which they endured from their neighbours and countrymen, as instigated by the unbelieving Jews; even as the Christians in Judea were hated and persecuted by those of their own nation. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Note, Acts 17:5—9.) Nor should this excite any astonishment; seeing the Jews, though professed worshippers of the one living and true God, had murdered the promised Messiah, as their ancestors had the prophets; and they persecuted the apostles and disciples of Christ, from a proud and blind zeal for the ritual law, and the traditions of the elders. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, Matt. 23:29—39. Acts 7:51—60.) In this, they were far indeed from pleasing God, as some of them vainly imagined; (Notes, John 16:1—3. Acts 26:9—11.) nay, they exceedingly provoked him: and they "were contrary to all men," and opposed, as much as possible, the salvation both of Jews and Gentiles: especially, as they prohibited, and did all in their power to hinder, the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles; as if they could not endure that they should be saved. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) Thus, with ceaseless efforts, they "filled up the measure" of their personal and national iniquities, for which the wrath of God was, even then, about to come upon them to the uttermost, in the destruction of the city and temple; the slaughter of immense multitudes of the nation; the scattering, enslaving, and abject miseries of the survivors; and the most unheard of calamities of every kind, pursuing them into every region of the earth, throughout numerous successive generations, even to this day. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Dan. 9:24—27. Zech. 5:5—11. Matt. 24: Mark 13: Luke 21:)—The morose and unsocial bigotry of the Jews, respecting all Gentiles, from the time when they ceased to copy their idolatries, is largely insisted on by commentators in general; and the testimony of Gentiles is adduced in proof of it. This evidence, however, is not much to be regarded: for if the Jews had shown the most compassionate, liberal, and friendly attention to idolaters in temporal things; while they steadily adhered to the divine law, by separating from them in all things relating to religion; the clamour of the Gentiles against their bigotry would not have been silenced, if it had been even abated. The steady refusal of what some have called an intercommunity of deities and religious rites, would have sufficed to keep up the prejudice against Jews, and the disdain of them, among the proud Greeks and Romans; for the same reasons, that no philanthropy or liberality can exempt those from contempt and reproach, even among professed Christians, who unreservedly avow their attachment to the doctrines of the gospel as their rule of faith, and the precepts of Christ as their rule of conduct. The Jews were, however, in this respect, very blameable; and so are many Christians: but the grand point, which here demands consideration, is this; that the determined opposition of the Jewish nation, to the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles, was the immediate cause of "wrath coming on them to the uttermost." Let Britain, let every inhabitant of Britain, tremble at the thought of opposing the cause of missions among the heathen, as too many are disposed to do, "lest wrath come upon us also to the uttermost."—'They who obstruct the progress of the gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are the ministers of Satan, and therefore bear his name.' (18) Whitby.—It should also be distinctly noted, that the apostle does not give the least intimation, that the Gentiles could be saved by Christ, or in any other way, unless the gospel were preached to them. (Notes, Rom. 10:12—17. Eph. 2:11,12.)

V. 17—20. The apostle had been driven by violence from the Thessalonians; but his affections were still with them. The painful separation (for he had left them with as much reluctance as a parent parts with his children, whom he leaves as orphans in this evil world) was only for a short season, or for "the space of one hour;" for the apostle's mind was 'full of the ideas of eternity, which did, as it were, annihilate any period of mortal life.' Doddridge. He had, however, been exceedingly desirous of returning to them, which he had attempted with abundant earnestness; (for in this he spake of himself, as Timothy had visited them again, and perhaps Silvanus also;) but Satan, by exciting disturbances and opposition to him at Berea and in other places, had hindered him from effecting his purpose, seeing he could not have come with propriety. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, Zech. 3:1—5. Rom. 1:13—16.) Otherwise, they might be sure, that he gladly would have come, and that he would embrace the first opportunity of so doing. For what, did they suppose, was the object of his "hope," in the work of the ministry, but such success as he had met with among them? Or what was his "joy and crown of exultation," in that respect, but to see numbers of such affectionate converts to Christ as they were; whom he could look upon, as those in whom he should rejoice before the Lord Jesus, at his coming to judge the world? (Marg. Ref. i, l. Notes, 1:9,10. 4:13—18. Phil. 2:14—18.) For, indeed, he and his brethren did not "glory" or rejoice in

CHAPTER III.

The apostle shows, that his care for the Christians at Thessalonica had induced him to send Timothy, to establish and encourage them, 1—5; whose good report concerning them had been a great comfort to him in his distresses, 6—8. He thanks God in their behalf, and shows how earnestly he desires to see them, 9, 10; and prays, that he may be enabled to visit them; and for their growth in holiness and love, and perseverance to the end, 11—13.

WHEREFORE, [a]when we could no longer forbear, [b]we thought it good to be left at Athens alone:

2 And sent [c]Timotheus, [d]our brother, and minister of God, and our fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ, [e]to establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith:

3 That no man should be [f]moved by these afflictions: for yourselves know that [g]we are appointed thereunto.

4 For verily, when we were with you, [b]we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; [i]even as it came to pass, and ye know.

5 For this cause, [k]when I could no longer for bear, [l]I sent to know your faith, [m]lest by some

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Confidence in God, zeal for his glory, love to the souls of men, and conscious integrity, will support faithful ministers amidst manifold hardships and sufferings: and when they have "suffered and been shamefully used" in one place, they will not at all be disposed to decline further labours and perils; but relying on the divine protection and support, they will be courageous in speaking the gospel of God in another situation. Even when their ministry excites the opposition of unbelievers, and constrains them to engage in argument, and to "contend earnestly" for the truth; though they love peace, and hate disputatious contests, they must persevere in their testimony: for they "cannot but speak the things which they have heard and known." (Note, Jude 3,4.) All ministers should be careful, that their preaching be far removed from fallacy, deceit, and a licentious tendency; and that their motives be equally pure from all artful designs of advancing, enriching, or indulging themselves, by means of their ministry. For such scandalous discoveries have been made, respecting priests of different religions, and even the more plausible and earnest of them; that men are very apt to suspect some fraud, or corrupt intention, lurking under a great appearance of zeal and devotion. It is in vain to oppose arguments to this deep-rooted suspicion, except they are corroborated by manifest facts.—We ought to consider ourselves, as "allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel;" and recollect that this is the most important stewardship, which ever was or can be committed to man: our faithfulness in it will produce the happiest consequences to ourselves and others; our unfaithfulness will constitute the most aggravated guilt, and ensure the deepest condemnation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:1,2. 1 Tim. 6:20,21. 2 Tim. 1:11—14. 2:1,2.) We should, therefore, by no means "seek to please men;" but simply study to "approve ourselves to God who trieth the hearts." Even the approbation of pious men may be fallacious, and may interfere with our simplicity, in aiming to please the Lord by faithfulness to our trust. A man may indeed, by harshness and severity, in his manner of stating the truth, prevent his own usefulness; but selfish principles will far more generally lead men to temporize, to palliate, and to "speak smooth things." This strain tends to bring the hearers into a good humour with themselves, and that makes them friendly to the preacher; which may be greatly conducive to his popularity and secular advantage, and for a time even add to his reputation. It is therefore a very great thing indeed, for a minister to be able on good grounds to say, "Neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloak of covetousness, God is witness; nor of men sought we glory:" and to be able to appeal both to the Lord and to men, that he has constantly receded even from his equitable claims, out of love to the souls of his hearers, and lest he should be "burdensome to them." But, when this decided faithfulness, this unambitious, disinterested, and self-denying "plainness of speech," on all occasions, unites with equal tenderness and affection; so that the same persons can say, "We were gentle among you, even as a nursing mother cherisheth her own children: so, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us;" then the servants of Christ come as near to the mind of their Lord, as can be conceived attainable by mortal men. There are, however, but few, if any, who are not warped, either one way or the other, by constitution, habit, or circumstances: it behooves us therefore to search out our spirits, to be open to conviction, and to guard against our own peculiar weakness. (Note, Luke 9:51—56. P. O. 46—56.)—If we be desirous of the character of able, faithful, and affectionate ministers of Christ, we must not shrink from "labour and toil, day or night." We should cheerfully endure hardship, both in preaching the gospel; and also in diligent endeavours to "avoid being chargeable to" those who are unable or unwilling to assist us: and we ought to aim at a noble ambition of being able to appeal to men, as well as unto God, that we have behaved ourselves with purity and equity, and in a blameless manner, among those with whom we were most intimately conversant. This will give energy to our words, whilst we "exhort, encourage, and charge" our people, to walk worthy of God, who "hath called them to his kingdom and glory." Indeed, we ought always to have their welfare at heart, as entirely as a good and wise father has that of his children: and to seek it, with the same affectionate and assiduous earnestness, from the most disinterested motives.

V. 13—20. It is incumbent on us, to "give thanks to God without ceasing," in behalf of those, who receive the gospel from us, not as the opinion of fallible men, but as the "sure testimony of the Lord, which maketh wise the simple." This it most certainly is, as far as any man preaches according to the Scriptures; however unlearned, obscure, or frail he may be. When thus received with reverent faith and obedient attention, it "works effectually" an entire change in the judgment, disposition, and characters of men: they become not so much followers of this or the other leader of a sect, as imitators of the primitive Christians, and so of Christ himself: and should in consequence expect to be reviled and persecuted by their neighbours, (as far as outward circumstances will admit,) even as the first converts to the gospel were by the Jews. For the same nature is in men, of every age and clime, which was in those "who killed the Lord Jesus and the holy prophets," and who "persecuted the apostles" and disciples of the Saviour: and Satan, who "worketh in the children of disobedience," hates the pure gospel of Christ, and the faithful preaching of it to sinners of all descriptions, as much as he did of old. But they who would forbid us thus to preach to "the chief of sinners," and to those who are dead in sin, and to send or carry the gospel, and the word of God, to the heathen, "that they may be saved," do not in this "please God, and they are contrary to all men." The object and motives of those in general, who would hinder the publishing of the gospel, in any part of the world, are manifest: they idolize worldly interests, care little for the temporal good and nothing for the souls of men, and either hate or slight the genuine and unadulterated word of God. But it is grievous to think, that some apparently pious men, misled by an undue attachment to system, should in any way or degree, countenance the conduct of those who in every age are actuated by the same worldly, proud, bigoted, and selfish spirit, which influenced the Jews of old, when filling up the measure of their sins, "till wrath came upon them to the uttermost."—The affectionate and faithful ministers of Christ may be forced from those with whom their hearts are most united: and they may be frustrated, through the devices of Satan, in their most earnest desires and endeavours to come to them again: yet their separation will be only for a short space. Their "hope and joy" are intimately connected with the spiritual growth and fruitfulness of those who have profited by their labours. These are now "their crown of rejoicing and glorying," far more than all possible commendation from other men. (Note, Phil. 4:1.) And they will meet them, in the presence of the Lord Jesus, at his coming, as "their glory and joy:" and then all the pangs of their partings and separations will be richly and eternally compensated.

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—5. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Acts 17:10—15. 18:1—6.) Timothy came from Berea to Athens, while Paul was there; but it seems that Silas did not.—The apostle, being anxious about the new converts at Thessalonica, could not endure to remain any longer in suspense, or to act as if he were unconcerned for their welfare: (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:12,13. 7:5—7.) he therefore decidedly chose and submissively acquiesced to be left alone at Athens, though that must have been very inconvenient to him: and he sent back Timothy to Thessalonica, to establish the Christians of that city in the faith, by suitable instructions, which he was eminently qualified to give them; and to exhort and encourage them to hold fast their profession, whatever opposition they might meet with, by assuring them of peculiar protection, consolation, and reward. This was intended to prevent any of them from being "moved" to renounce or disguise their faith, by means of the afflictions to which it exposed them: for they could not but know, if they understood the nature of their profession that the dis-

6 But now, [o]when Timotheus came from you unto us, [p]and brought us good tidings of your [q]faith and charity, [r]and that ye have good remembrance of us always, [s]desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you:

7 Therefore, brethren, [t]we were comforted over you [u]in all our affliction and distress by your faith:

8 For now [x]we live, [y]if ye stand fast in the Lord.

9 For [z]what thanks can we render to God again for you, [a]for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes [b]before our God;

10 [c]Night and day [d]praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and [e]might perfect that which is lacking in your faith?

11 Now [f]God himself and our Father, [g]and our Lord Jesus Christ, [h]direct [h]our way unto you.

12 And [i]the Lord make you to increase and [k]abound in [l]love one toward another, and toward all men, [m]even as we do toward you:

13 To the end [n]he may stablish your hearts [o]unblamable in holiness [p]before God, even our Father, [q]at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ [r]with all his saints.

ciples of Christ were appointed to have fellowship with him in his sufferings. Their situation, amidst the enemies of God, and their doctrine and character, would render contempt and enmity unavoidable: Satan would certainly stir up persecutions as far as he could: and it pleased the Lord to appoint them a certain measure of suffering, for the trial of their faith, the progress of their sanctification, and the honour of the powerful and excellent effects of his grace in them. (Marg. Ref. c—h. Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. 10:21—28. John 15:17—21. 2 Cor. 4:13—18., 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 3:10—12. Heb. 12:4—11.) This the apostle had plainly and confidently predicted, and warned them to expect, when he was with them, even before the persecution had begun: he had never allowed them to be deluded by an expectation of peace or prosperity; but had taught them to look for tribulations from without, and for inward consolations. Accordingly it had come to pass: so that he and his helpers had been driven from them by furious persecutions. He had thus left them in the midst of a fiery trial; and he had sent to see how they had stood it, and whether their faith had thus been proved genuine: (Rom. 5:3—5. Jam. 1:1—4. 1 Pet. 1:6,7. 4:12—16.) for he could not wholly divest himself of solicitude, lest the tempter, even Satan, should have prevailed against them by his manifold artifices, to renounce the faith, and comply with the idolatry of their neighbours; and lest his unwearied labours for their eternal salvation should thus prove in vain. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Note, 1:1—4.) Some would explain, what the apostle here speaks concerning persecution, exclusively of himself and the other apostles and evangelists; as if the enemies pleaded this argument against the divine original of Christianity: and as if the danger of the Thessalonians arose, not from any persecutions to which they themselves were exposed, but from the vain reasonings of their heathen neighbours, respecting those which the apostle endured, and his leaving Thessalonica on account of them. But the Thessalonians were themselves exposed to persecution; as all must expect to be "who live godly in Christ Jesus;" and what they suffered or dreaded would be at least as likely to "move them," as any reasonings of their enemies; and such reasonings of philosophical opposers do not appear to have existed at so early a period. V. 6—10. During Timothy's absence, Paul departed from Athens to Corinth; whither Timothy and Silas also returned to him. The tidings which he received from Thessalonica, concerning the faith and love of the brethren in that city, and their affectionate remembrance of him, and earnest reciprocal desire to see him, were so entirely satisfactory; that they not only relieved his mind from anxiety, but abundantly compensated for all his other trials and distresses, and filled his benevolent heart with consolation. (Marg. Ref. o—u. Note, 2 Cor. 7:5—7.) For indeed he seemed to enjoy life with great relish, and to live to some purpose, when his spiritual children "stood fast in the faith," hope, love, and obedience of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Acts 11:23,24. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 16:13,14. Phil. 4:1. Nor could he find language sufficiently energetic to express the gratitude which he owed to God, and the thanks which he was excited to render him, on their account: and for that overflowing joy with which this inspired his heart before God: whilst night and day he poured out his unremitted prayers, that he might have the satisfaction of once again seeing them, and of perfecting what was wanting in their faith, whether in respect of knowledge in the testimonies and promises of God; or the realizing assurance, with which they credited them, and depended on them. (Marg. Ref. z—e.)—'Esthius observes, from the 9th verse, that both the apostles' joy, and their faith and constancy, were the gift of God: . . . for giving of thanks is not, except for benefits received. He might also have observed the excellent pattern the apostle here gives to all the bishops and pastors of the church, to be continually solicitous to know of the welfare of their flock; incessantly praying for it, blessing God daily for it, and looking upon it as the very felicity of their own lives.' Whithy.
